Within weeks she escaped to join a partisan group, serving as a soldier and nurse under primitive conditions in the forest.

Schulman's rifle became "a friend" as well as her pillow during the two years she lived in the woods. She felt a deep need to fight and "lift the dignity of the Jewish people."

As a partisan, she burned her childhood home, so the Nazis "wouldn't have a place to settle."

Her late husband, Morris, also a partisan, specialized in blowing up trains headed for the front line.

Schulman saw many partisans die, among them a young man she accompanied on a risky mission. Schulman was left to complete their task when he left their canoe before her and was blown to bits by a live mine.

She wants the younger generation to know of the bravery of Jewish partisans. "They fought very hard. Unfortunately not that many survived. Maybe this is why we hear so little about them. There is something to be proud of."

Among those on stage for the presentation was Holocaust survivor Robert Engel, whose face appears on the stamp as part of a collage.

Dinner raises close to $450,000 for WIZO's Women for Women project

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A recent tribute dinner raised close to $450,000 for Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's Women for Women project offering a network of services for battered women in Israel.

Over 600 people attended the $500-a-plate event organized by Toronto Hadassah-WIZO in honor of Maureen Kempston Darkes, president and general manager of Canada's largest automobile manufacturing company, General Motors of Canada Limited.

The dinner was held at the Sheraton Centre Hotel on Nov. 5, one day after the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

After consultation with Toronto's Israeli Consulate, it was decided to proceed with the dinner because of the importance of helping abused women, an organizer told The CJN. A moment of silence was observed in Rabin's honor, and plans to have musicians present were cancelled.

Among the services funded by Women for Women through WIZO (the international umbrella organization for Canadian Hadassah-WIZO) are telephone hotlines in Hebrew, Russian and Amharic, a shelter for battered women, 29 legal advice bureaus, self-help groups and educational programs for police and other professionals.

Darkes was praised by dinner chair Karen Miller for quickly responding in support of the project.

"It's characteristic of her modesty that her willingness to accept this tribute was born entirely of her belief that it represented an opportunity to advance not herself but an important and deserving cause," said Robert Prichard, president of the University of Toronto, Darkes' alma mater. The low-profile 47-year-old honoree completed both her undergraduate and law degrees at U of T.

Darkes' response, which began with a well-spoken tribute to Rabin and his peace efforts, made reference to the need for debt reduction at every level of government. "It will be increasingly up to the business community to come forward, enhance their social responsibility and support worthwhile causes," she said.

Other speakers included Judy Mandleman, Vancouver-based president of Hadassah-WIZO Canada, who paid tribute to Rabin; Senator Trevor Eyton; William Saunderson, minister of economic development, trade and tourism; Mel Lastman, mayor of North York; Nancy Diamond, mayor of Oshawa; and Henry Jackman, lieutenant governor of Ontario. Scheduled speaker Jehudi Kinar, consul general of Israel, was en route to Rabin's funeral.

Former Ontario premier William Davis was emcee for the evening. Vivien Sharon, president, Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, made a presentation to Darkes. Marvin Rosenshein sang the national anthems of Canada and Israel.

'Settler' mission alters focus

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A one-week mission to Israel in support of Jewish settlers has changed its focus in the wake of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination on Nov. 4.

Now renamed Achdut Yisrael to express solidarity with all the people of Israel, the mission which left Toronto last Wednesday was planned locally by Jewish Action Coalition (JAC). The fledgling grassroots organization had spearheaded three demonstrations outside the Israeli Consulate to protest the Israeli government's handling of the peace process. (CJN, Nov. 2)

An American contingent of some 200 people who were to take part in the mission have pulled out.

The approximately 45 Canadian participants will be billeted with settler families as planned, but a march scheduled for Nov. 13 in Jerusalem was cancelled.

"People are reassessing," said George Meister of JAC. "There's a lot of finger-pointing now. We have to ask what we can do to avoid something like this happening in the future."

Although he describes himself as right wing, Meister takes care to point out that his political views don't preclude an open mind.

Even before the assassination, he was in contact with Peace Now about planning a public dialogue representing divergent viewpoints within the Jewish community.

In Israel, he hoped to promote dialogue between different factions as well. "We all want peace," he said.

1,000 book Israel trip

TORONTO — Organizers are scrambling to find additional planes and hotel rooms for the largest mission to Israel in Canadian history.

Mission 3000, Feb. 19 to 28, 1996, a United Jewish Appeal/ United Israel Appeal (UIA) project, has already signed up 1,000 Canadian participants. More than a third are from Toronto.

Steve Ain, UIA Canada executive vice-president, promises that every effort will be made to accommodate those whose names are now on a growing waiting list.

The mission will visit Israel from Metulla to Eilat, with intineraries individualized .

"Every day will be a highlight. Every day will be better than the next," Ain told hundreds of prospective mission members and past participants at a Toronto meeting last week.

"We're not going to show you the country. We're going to share it with you," said Victor Yagoda, mission director for UIA Canada.

Mission co-chairs Herb Rosenfeld and Rosanne Ain believe the trip's all inclusive price of $1,996 has been a huge draw.

Harnick at CJB Breakfast

TORONTO — The proposed closing of North York Branson hospital is only a recommendation, Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick told some 175 people recently at the annual installation breakfast of the Council of Jewish Brotherhoods of Metropolitan Toronto and vicinity.

The council's 1995 executive was installed, with Sheldon Berg as president.

Harnick said closing Branson is not government policy, but rather a recommendation of a report advocating the closure of 12 Metro acute care hospitals, released by the district health council earlier this autumn. The health ministry will be analyzing the report before it takes any steps, he added.

Harnick said he's supporting his constituents in the riding of Willowdale in their fight to keep Branson open, even setting aside partisan politics to work with Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter, who represents the riding of Wilson Heights, he said.

As for pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel, Harnick said the attorney general can only prosecute him, or any other perpetrators of hate, if the police lay charges. His ministry cannot initiate any charge nor change the hate law, he said.

"We administer the laws the federal government passes."

Harnick also assured the audience that Premier Mike Harris, who is on the board of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, is a "friend of the Jewish community."

Mankowitz Speaks

TORONTO — The Jewish world is undergoing a "revolutionary" change in the way the Diaspora relates to Israel, and in the workings of the Jewish state itself, leading Israeli educator Ze'ev Mankowitz believes.

The great institutions of nation-building are losing their lustre and are undergoing fundamental changes as Israel moves into a new era, he said.

"It's becoming less of a nation state with an overriding collective agenda and more of a civil state that's beginning to pay attention to the needs of its citizens," Mankowitz said.

As a result, the era of large "collective goals" like the draining of swamps, settling the Negev and ingathering of exiles are beginning to take a back seat to the same individualistic goals sought in Western democracies like Canada and the United States, he said.

Historic institutions like the Jewish Agency and the Histadrut are being restructured to make them conform to changing needs, Mankowitz said.

The philanthropy that has been a centrepiece of Diaspora/Israeli relations will change as well, Mankowitz predicted. Contributions from the Jewish world amount to only 1.5 per cent of Israel's gross domestic product while the need for funds in the Diaspora, particularly for continuity programs and education, is growing.

"If we don't move beyond philanthropy, we'll be in trouble. We have to find new forms of cooperation," he said.

Mankowitz, director of the Melton Center for Jewish education in the Diaspora at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, was in Toronto as a guest of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT). During his one-week visit, he addressed educators, students and JFGT professionals.

Seniors and Health Care

TORONTO — The close vote in Quebec's referendum will result in some "rethinking" on federal and provincial cutbacks to social services, says Warren Allmand, Liberal MP for NDG riding, who has opposed the Liberal caucus decisions on cuts.

Allmand spoke recently to about 1,100 seniors at a public forum at St. Lawrence Centre. The turnout was so large that Allmand and other speakers had to address the crowd twice, in the Bluma Appel and Jane Mallett theatres.

The forum was sponsored by the Alliance of Seniors to Protect Canada's Social Programs, including the Association of Jewish Seniors and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. Special buses brought many to the forum. Al Gorlick and Frances Chapkin were co-chairs.

"If it was a big No vote that would be not so good," Allmand said. "But two-thirds of those who voted Yes are soft Yeses, they're not really separatists. They're sending a message to the government. This is a good time to stick your foot in the door."

There is no intention in the Liberal caucus to transfer health care to the provinces, Allmand said in reply to a questioner worried about falling standards if that took place.

The forum approved a resolution calling on the government to end cuts to welfare and health services, and post-secondary education, and to restore the universality of Old Age Security by eliminating clawbacks. The Canada Pension Plan and Guaranteed Income Supplement programs should be maintained, the resolution said.

Zerker and Fackenheim

TORONTO — The chances of phase two of the Oslo accords leading to a real peace are poor, not only because Yasser Arafat is unable or unwilling to be a true partner in the process, but also because it is based on inherently false premises, according to Prof. Emil Fackenheim of Hebrew University and York University Prof. Sally Zerker.

They were speaking to a crowd of over 200 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation at a recent program sponsored by the synagogue's adult education committee, Herut-Likud and the Toronto Zionist Council.

The program took place prior to the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Zerker, a non-Israeli, reminded "those who accuse me of presumption that more than half the people of Israel also oppose Oslo 2. A recent poll said that 60 per cent of the population wants a referendum."

Fackenheim urged North Americans to come to Israel to show Israelis, particularly the government, what democracy means.

The contribution of Women in Green, who are mostly from the West, he said, is to show that "the opposition is to be treated with respect."

Fackenheim said he is concerned that Jewish settlers will be abandoned, that Palestinians will claim their area is too small once their refugees return, and especially, that Jerusalem is in danger of falling under non-Jewish control.

"If Peres has lied about everything else, why would you trust what he says about Jerusalem?"

There is a widespread "crisis of faith in Zionism," he said. "We must work to restore the belief that Zionism is just."

Yiddish Storytelling

TORONTO — Roslyn Bresnick-Perry was 56 when she went to university.

As the oldest student, she was often asked to give firsthand accounts of her experiences. A natural spinner of yarns, she began a second career and has become a nationally known storyteller, author and prize-winning recording artist.

The 70-something New Yorker was one of the featured artists at the fourth annual Jewish Storytelling festival which took place recently here.

She performed with Leslie Robbins, Shulamis Yelin, Alec Gelcer, and Neila and Neshama, the wife and daughter respectively of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, for an audience of 200 at the gala storytelling concert held at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Bresnick-Perry is committed to passing on stories of shtetl life to younger generations, she said. "I want to keep alive my memories of my whole family," most of whom perished during the Holocaust.

Yelin, 82, a storyteller from Montreal, lamented the decline of Yiddish. A well-known author, poet and educator, she has lectured and read her works internationally. Last year, she won a special award from Jewish People's Peretz School for her contribution to Jewish literature.

Neshama Carlebach said the wound of Shlomo Carlebach's death a year ago is far from healed. "It feels like it happened an hour ago. Singing his music makes me feel like I'm in heaven [with him]. Telling his stories brings me one step closer."

Military allowed racist soldiers

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Membership in white supremacist organizations was not a barrier to enlistment in the Armed Forces at the time a peacekeeping mission was sent to Somalia, the federal inquiry into the conduct of the Airborne Regiment heard last week.

"Being a member of an extremist group would not have been a matter for discipline at that time," said Cmdr. Paul Jenkins, who headed a special investigation into the right-wing extremist activities of some soldiers at Canadian Forces Base Petawawa. He was answering questions from Keith Landy, council for Canadian Jewish Congress, which with B'nai Brith Canada, has limited standing at the inquiry.

Documents introduced at the hearings showed that several soldiers from CFB Petawawa were present at a two-day white supremacist rally in Ottawa in July 1991. They were subsequently investigated but not disciplined.

Aryan Resistance

One soldier, an admitted member of the violent Aryan Resistance Movement, left the military when his period of service ended in 1992 but was allowed to re-enlist two years later, at a time when the Armed Forces had supposedly established a zero tolerance policy towards racism.

Congress also alleged that soldiers at CFB Petawawa held a "Marc Lepine memorial dinner" in a mess hall on Dec. 6, 1991 — the second anniversary of the Montreal massacre — to honor the killer of the massacre's 14 female victims.

Bernie Farber, speaking for Congress, admitted he had no evidence to back the claim but said the information came from a reliable source.

The holding of the dinner was corroborated last week by several media outlets.

Rubin Friedman, director of government relations for B'nai Brith, said the cross-examination of Jenkins showed there was no concern about racism within the Armed Force before the peacekeeping mission to Somalia ended in disgrace after the murder of a teenage Somali boy who was held prisoner by Canadian troops.

"They were given no instructions to treat this as a serious issue. In 1993, after seeing media reports, they decided to look into it. Anything they have done on racism has been entirely politically motivated," he said.

Education fund to purchase Israel Bonds

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — A newly established educational endowment fund will be watched with interest by the national State of Israel Bonds office in Toronto and if successful, may be adopted across the country.

A first in Canada, the Educational Endowment Fund (TEEF) will purchase State of Israel Bonds here to fund its program.

TEEF will be officially launched at a breakfast Nov. 19, 9:30 a.m. at Adas Israel Synagogue, where the honoree will be Rabbi Zev Eisenstein, the Hamilton Hebrew Academy's principal for the past 23 years. Co-chairs are Dr. David and Ilana Feldman.

TEEF is the brainchild of Hamilton Bonds general chair, Al Rams.

"Almost $2 to $2½ million per year," he estimates, "is sent out of the [Hamilton] community to benefit Israel." Yet very little is raised for local needs, he says.

TEEF's aim is to make funds available for educational purposes, over and above money raised through the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and allocated by the federation to the day school and the afternoon and Sunday Hebrew and religious schools.

These funds would be used for special projects, programs and the purchase of educational aids, as long as, the official announcement states, "they fall within the guidelines of providing Jewish/Hebrew education for all members of the community — children, teens and adults."

TEEF will actively engage in fundraising through various social functions such as bingo nights, fashion shows and tribute cards, plus one annual gala event at which a person prominent in the education field will be honored.

All major local fundraising groups, which raise money for Israel but direct very little of their efforts towards support of the local community, will be asked to contribute by organizing one event per year, Rams says.

He also hopes to involve the synagogues which would benefit from TEEF.

With the money raised, TEEF will purchase Bonds, the interest on which will in turn go to the educational endowment fund.

"It's the ultimate double mitzvah whereby our community supports the State of Israel through the purchase of Bonds," while Israel in turn supports our educational programs through the interest on these Bonds, says Rams.

TEEF will be administered by the federation in conjunction with the already established community endowment fund; disbursements will be made by the endowment committee, says Rams.

B.C. communities hold memorial rallies for Rabin

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The communities here and in Vancouver paid tribute to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin as a hero in war and in peace.

Both communities held hastily organized memorial rallies, attracting hundreds of mourners from both the Jewish and general population.

Rabbi Victor Reinstein, of Victoria's Congregation Emanu-El, converted the regular Mincha service on Nov. 5 to a memorial, welcoming Jews and those "from the wider community," including a number of city councillors.

"We mourn a great man," said the rabbi. "His mission for peace cannot be stopped. Rabin was a tough soldier and military leader — a hero. But he realized that a change was needed and launched his country on the path to peace. His ultimate goal was to make friends of the enemy. His peacemaking far exceeded his stature as a soldier."

Rabbi Reinstein noted that Mincha is a service devoted to comfort, and he asked the congregation to join in comforting Rabin's grieving family, the people of Israel and Jews, Christians and Muslims everywhere who were beneficiaries of the Prime Minister's quest for peace.

A group of tearful Israelis who teach at the congregational Hebrew school, sang the number Rabin had joined in singing at the Tel Aviv rally just before he was gunned down. The entire assembly joined in reciting the Kaddish.

The Victoria Times-Colonist's banner headline on Sunday was "Shalom Chaver." In addition to the wire story on the assassination, the paper carried a local story of tributes.

Leah Levi, a Victoria native who lived in Israel for several years, sobbed uncontrollably when she was told about the killing.

Her Israeli husband, Uriel, said Rabin "will be missed unbelievably." He said the assassination could spark a crackdown on far-right extremists who claim the prime minister was a traitor for agreeing to Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank. There are great fears in Israel, he added, about the ultra-right extremist minority.

Michael Goldberg, a past president of the shul, said that though local Jews have a range of opinions on the peace initiative, none would have approved of assassination.

"We're feeling devastated about the news," said Irvine Margolese, a community leader, at a meeting at the Jewish Comunity Centre for Detroit Rabbi Sherwin Wine on the Saturday night. Margolese called for a minute's silence in tribute to Rabin as the meeting started.

Rabbi Wine, founder of the Society For Humanistic Jews, a secular international organization, said: "I'm shocked and haven't fully recovered from the shock of this major tragedy for the Jewish world and the world in general."

The fact that Rabin was killed by somebody who claimed to be an agent of G-d is an unhappy reflection of a powerful movement of religious fundamentalism, he said. "We now have Jewish religious fundamentalists who feel they have a G-d given right to obliterate anyone they don't agree with."

In Vancouver on Nov. 6, an evening memorial service was held at Schara Tzedeck Synagogue — the largest in the city. The service was organized by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) and the Pacific region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The B.C. Jewish community is in shock and mourning," said Drew Staffenberg of the JFGV and Erwin Nest of Congress, in announcing the service.

Dr. Michael Elterman, Congress regional chair, said the slaying doesn't indicate that opposing political factions can't compromise. "The assassination does not fall within the domain of Israeli politics," he declared.

Rabbi Philip Bregman said, "I have a feeling of profound sadness. Israel and the Middle East and the world are a lot poorer now. Once again the ultimate price is paid by an individual who was trying to bring peace to the world. The fact that the assassin is an Israeli makes it even more horrible."

A commemorative address was given at the Vancouver service by Rabbi Mordechai Feuerstein, and the K'El Maleh Rachamin was chanted by Cantor Yaacov Orzech. Cantor Murray Dixon recited the Kaddish.

Brig.-Gen. Itzchak Fuchs, the new Jewish National Fund shaliach in British Columbia, delivered a memorial tribute to his former commander.

Condolences were extended by Premier Mike Harcourt, Mayor Philip Owen and Vancouver MP Edward McWhinnev.

IDF leaves Jenin

CJN News Services

JENIN — Israel ended its military occupation of Jenin last Monday, withdrawing its troops from the West Bank city under the self-rule deal signed with the PLO in September.

Israel is pushing ahead with moves to implement the Olso 2 accords despite the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Palestinians danced and chanted "God is Great" as 15 Israeli army jeeps left Jenin's military headquarters under PLO escort. Israeli soldiers waved goodbye as Palestinian policemen and civilians rushed into the military complex.

Local supporters of the PLO fired automatic weapons into the air in celebration.

About 500 Palestinian policemen arrived from the West Bank self-rule enclave of Jericho before dawn to take charge of Jenin in the north of the West Bank. They immediately deployed throughout the city.

Under the deal signed in Washington in September, Israel agreed to leave six Palestinian cities and parts of Hebron and to hand over civil powers and limited security responsibilities in 450 West Bank towns, villages and refugee camps to the PLO.

It is due to complete its military redeployment, except for Hebron, a flashpoint of Jewish-Arab violece where about 400 Jewish settlers live among more than 100,000 Palestinians, late in December.

The transfer of authority in Jenin was to be complete this week, with the handing over of the last spheres of civil authority.

Non-orthodox conversions approved

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In a landmark 6-1 decision, Israel's Supreme Court last Sunday accorded de facto to recognition to Reform and Conservative conversions performed in Israel, but declined to recognize them explicitly.

"The meaning [of this decision] is a revolution of historic proportions," said Rabbi Uri Regev, who heads the Reform movement in Israel. "Another breach has been made in the wall of the Orthodox monopoly."

However, he added, Reform and Conservative converts are still "second-class citizens," because they cannot marry in Israel.

Current law gives the Chief Rabbinate sole control over marriage and divorce, and only the Knesset can change that.

The Chief Rabbinical Council, meanwhile, held an emergency meeting Monday to discuss the ruling.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau said there had never been such a "harsh" decision "endangering" the future of the Jewish people and Israel as a Jewish state.

Reflecting the comments of many other rabbis, Jerusalem Chief Rabbi Yitzhak Kolitz said that even if the Interior Ministry did register Reform and Conservative converts as Jews, rabbis would not marry them because they would not be Jewish according to Halachah.

The case was brought by Eliane Goldstein, a Brazilian who underwent a Reform conversion after marrying an Israeli, then asked the Interior Ministry to register her as a Jew. The ministry refused.

The court ruled that the ministry's reason for refusal was invalid. The state had argued that the conversion was invalid.

However, the court said this ordinance applies only where conversions touch on matters of personal status, such as marriage and divorce. It said it does not apply to civil issues, such as how a person is registered.

"It is possible that a man could be considered Jewish for the sake of one law, but not be considered Jewish for the sake of another law," the ruling states.

However, it added, the court was asked to consider only whether the state's reason was wrong — not whether Reform conversions are valid.

Therefore, it cannot state that a Reform conversion enables Goldstein to be registered as a Jew.

What type of conversions are valid for religious purposes should be decided by the Knesset, it said.

Reform and Conservative conversions performed overseas have been recognized as valid for religious purposes since 1989.

The following is the text of the letter of apology issued by the family of Yitzhak Rabin's confessed assassin, Yigal Amir, as reprinted from the New York Times.

To the Rabin family and all the people of Israel!

A terrible tragedy has befallen us and all the people of Israel with the murder by our son of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, of blessed memory.

The abominable murder was a terrible tragedy for us and for the people of Israel, one that has shaken all the foundations of education and values that we gave our children — love of the people of Israel, respect between human beings, love of the country and Jewish values.

Ashamed, grieving and mortified, we apologize and beg forgiveness from Mrs. Rabin, her family and from all the people of Israel, and hereby declare our objection to all acts of violence!

Again, the Amir family, parents, brothers and sisters, apologizes and begs forgiveness.

express deepest regrets upon the assassination of

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin ז"ל

We have been promoting democracy, peace, pluralism, tolerance and mutual respect for over 50 years.

We will long respect and remember Prime Minister Rabin's courage in moving Israel into an era of peace.

Our heartfelt condolences to the Rabin family, the citizens of Israel and all who value democracy, peace and tolerance.

We share in the sorrow.

Israeli withdrawals may lead to sovereign Palestinian state

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Within about 24 hours of Yitzhak Rabin's funeral in Jerusalem, the Israeli army resumed its withdrawal from Jenin, the first of several major Arab towns on the West Bank Israel is to evacuate as part of the Oslo 2 accord with the PLO.

Israel is crossing a historic line with the implementation of Oslo 2. Israel, in effect, has agreed to partition Palestine — relinquishing the dream of a Greater Israel and in all probability, setting the stage for the eventual establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Shimon Peres, Rabin's successor, fully shares his predecessor's vision of a peace settlement. It is sharply at odds with that of the right-wing opposition, which, for ideological, religious and military reasons, would retain eternal control of Judea and Samaria.

Rabin was not unsentimental about these biblical lands, the cradle of the Jewish people and the fulfilment of messianic yearnings.

But he was marching to a different drummer, whose echoes cautioned him against trying to dominate by force a people — the Palestinians — who desire to be free and independent.

As Rabin put it on Sept. 28 at the Oslo 2 signing ceremony in Washington: "The 2.2 million Palestinians in the territories are entirely different than us — religiously, politically, nationally. We don't want to rule over them."

Housing Minister Bejamin Ben-Eliezer, a former commander of Israeli troops in the West Bank, was even blunter: "The dream of Greater Israel is dead and buried forever ... The occupation is over."

Though anathema to a substantial number of Israeli Jews, these sentiments are not really startling bolts of lightning but rather expressions of the mainstream school of Labor Zionism.

The idea of partitioning Palestine, sacrilegious to Zionist Revisionists and religious Zionists, bubbled to the surface in the 1930s, writes Israeli scholar Ehud Sprinzak. Faced with a Palestinian revolt and a British colonial administration that was retreating from the promise of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, the Labor party (Mapai) leadership concluded that the Yishuv's only chance for statehood and international recognition lay in the principle of partition.

The Palestinian Arabs rejected the 1947 United Nations scheme dividing Palestine into a Jewish and an Arab state. As a result, they were dispossessed and scattered. But like the Jews, they were sustained by strong historical memories.

The Six Day War in 1967, which brought the West Bank under Israel's jurisdiction, revived the notion of territorial maximalism among Israeli rightists.

The Land of Israel Movement, with its insistence on keeping the West Bank forever, was born. Its spiritual leader, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook of the Mercaz Harav yeshivah in Jerusalem, warned that "the Torah forbids us to surrender even one inch of our liberated land."

With the acquiescence of the then Labor party government, his disciple, Rabbi Moshe Levinger, resettled Hebron. The Gush Emunim movement, encouraged by a Likud government, subsequently spearheaded the settlement drive in the territories.

By 1992, the year the Labor party swept back to power, the West Bank was dotted with some 120 settlements and populated by more than 110,000 Jews.

The new government, spurred on by such factors as the intifadah, the defanging of Iraq in the Gulf War, the demise of the Soviet Union and the trend toward moderation and realism in the PLO, began what many feel is the belated task of disengaging Israel from the Palestinians.

Rabin subscribed to the philosophy of separation — partition, in essence — because he feared that Israel would metamorphose into an unmanageable and volatile binational state if the territories were not jettisoned (in exchange, of course, for an equitable settlement with iron-clad security guarantees).

Till the end of his days, territorial compromise remained at the core of Rabin's policy. Yet he always made it clear that Israel's final borders should not — and would not — correspond to those of the pre-1967 era.

Rabin wanted to retain settlements in western Samaria close to the old Green Line, the Gush Etzion bloc near Jerusalem and parts or all of eastern Jerusalem.

In addition, he believed that Israel's "security border" should be located in the Jordan Valley.

We are shocked and saddened by the brutal assassination of the Israeli Prime Minister who lived and died for peace.
Yitzhak Rabin ז"ל

'Angels are accompanying you now'

The following is a translation of the remarks of Noa Ben-Artzi Philosof at the funeral of her grandfather, Yitzhak Rabin.

Please excuse me for not wanting to talk about the peace. I want to talk about my grandfather.

You always awake from a nightmare, but since yesterday I was continually awakening to a nightmare. It is not possible to get used to the nightmare of life without you. The television never ceases to broadcast pictures of you and you are so alive that I can almost touch you — but only almost, and I won't be able to anymore.

Grandfather, you were the pillar of fire in front of the camp and now we are left in the camp alone, in the dark; and we are so cold and so sad.

I know that people talk in terms of a national tragedy and of comforting an entire nation, but we feel the huge void that remains in your absence when grandmother doesn't stop crying.

Few people really knew you. Now they will talk about you for quite some time, but I feel that they really don't know just how great the pain is, how great the tragedy is; something has been destroyed. Grandfather, you were and still are our hero. I wanted you to know that every time I did anything, I saw you in front of me.

Your appreciation and your love accompanied us every step down the road and our lives were always shaped after your values. You, who never abandoned anything, are now abandoned. And here you are, my ever-present hero, cold, alone, and I cannot do anything to save you. You are missed so much.

Others greater than I have already eulogized you, but none of them ever had the pleasure I had to feel the caresses of your warm, soft hands, to merit your warm embrace that was reserved only for us, to see your half-smile that always told me so much, that same smile which is no longer, frozen in the grave with you.

I have no feelings of revenge because my pain and feelings of loss are so large, too large. The ground has been swept out from beneath us, and we are groping now, trying to wander about in this empty void, without any success so far.

I am not able to finish this; left with no alternative, I say goodbye to you, hero, and ask you to rest in peace, and think about us, and miss us, as down here we love you so very much. I imagine angels are accompanying you now and I ask them to take care of you, because you deserve their protection.

unit, students of Bar Ilan University, the son of the head of the surgery department of a major hospital. In every one, Israelis see themselves.

"The country is finished," cried Shimon Sheves, Rabin's longtime adviser and friend, moments after the prime minister's death.

A week later, it seems that Sheves was partly right. The country as we know it is finished.

Like the Yom Kippur War, the assassination of Rabin has left Israel shell-shocked. And like that war, the assassination of Rabin marks a new age in Israeli political culture.

Until October 1973, Israelis had an almost blind faith in government — a childlike belief that the leaders always know what's best for them. The leadership's total failure to anticipate an Arab attack exploded that myth, and with it the people's absolute faith in government. Today, it is the government's faith in the people that has been dealt a stunning blow. Today, it is the people's faith in each other that has been shattered.

"We used to think that as Jews we were all part of one family," says Jerusalemite Uri Forman. "We could fight and argue, but in the end we were all brothers. We would never hurt each other. There was trust. But now that's gone. It turns out that we are just like people in any other country. Strangers, not brothers."

The most overt sign of this new reality is that the people can no longer get close to government leaders. Everyone is suspect. When the Labor Party held a memorial for their slain leader last week, the entire downtown area of Tel Aviv was cordoned off and everyone entering the party headquarters, even Members of Knesset, was searched. Anyone without an official pass was whisked away.

Acting Prime Minister Shimon Peres could not even attend the public ceremony to dedicate Yitzhak Rabin Square later that day. Security officials insisted it would not be safe for him to be surrounded by so many people in the same spot where Rabin was gunned down.

Gone are the days when Israeli leaders would mingle in crowded open-air markets with shoppers and vendors, shaking hands and patting backs. Gone is the casual banter between cabinet ministers and the man in the street. Now every leader is surrounded by bodyguards, and the public must keep its distance. Gone is the age of innocence.

Israelis have learned that words kill. They are mobilizing to guard the level of public discourse. If leaders have bodyguards, institutions now have verbal watchdogs. In the first week after Rabin's death, a teacher was suspended, a university student expelled and a factory worker fired for praising the murder. Two Kiryat Arba Jews who cheered the assassination in front of foreign television crews were arrested for incitement. That word — incitement — evokes the same kind of anxiety that suspicious parcels once did. There is fear that inflammatory words will explode in everyone's face.

There is a terrible sense of fragility. "We never realized how vulnerable our democracy is," wrote one commentator in the Hebrew daily Yediot Aharonot. With that sense of fragility comes caution. Some say too much caution.

GETTING TO KNOW YOU

Canadian Ambassador to Israel David Berger enjoys a toast with President Ezer Weizman after formally presenting his credentials to the president.

Shin Bet says it knew of plot to kill Rabin

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Compounding the apparent security lapses that made the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin possible, the Shin Bet admitted last week that it had been told in advance of a plot to carry out the killing, but had been unable to locate the potential suspect.

The disclosure was the latest blow to Israel's domestic security service, which came under harsh criticism in the wake of an internal report targeting security lapses that made it possible for the assassin to get within point-blank shooting distance of Rabin at a Nov. 4 peace rally.

The head of the Shin Bet, identified only as "C" for security reasons, told last Sunday's weekly cabinet meeting that the information provided in advance about the assassination was too general.

He added that Shin Bet officials had received dozens of reports about possible assassination plots.

The Shin Bet head reportedly offered to resign, but was asked to stay on by Acting Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who said he should remain until a state commission of inquiry issued its findings.

Peres expressed his full confidence in the Shin Bet, particularly the division charged with protecting dignitaries. However, the head of that division was one of several Shin Bet officials who resigned in the wake of the assassination.

Peres also called on the cabinet to refrain from issuing public criticisms of the Shin Bet's operations.

The cabinet voted last week to establish a commission of inquiry into the assassination.

The three members of the commission — former Supreme Court President Meir Shamgar; reserve Maj.-Gen. Zvi Zamir, a former head of the Mossad; and Prof. Ariel Rosen-Zvi, dean of the faculty of law at Tel Aviv University — met for the first time last Friday.

The committee agreed to meet four days a week until it issued its findings.

Advance information about the assassination was conveyed to police last June, according to Israel Radio.

The informant was identified as Shlomo Halevy, a Jerusalem resident who studied law at Bar-Ilan University with the 25-year-old confessed assassin, Yigal Amir.

Israel Television reported that Halevy learned of Amir's plans from another friend, and then contacted a police officer who was his former commanding officer in the army.

Halevy gave a description of Amir, but not his name. Halevy's lawyer said this week that his client did not want to name Amir, in case the information was not accurate.

The revelation took place as Israeli authorities continued rounding up suspects in connection with the assassination.

Although Amir said he acted alone, police are pursuing the possibility that the killing of Rabin was the work of a group of right-wing conspirators.

A soldier serving in an elite combat unit was arrested last Friday on suspicion of supplying arms to Yigal Amir and his brother Hagai, who was also arrested in connection with the murder.

The soldier, identified as Arik Schwartz of Bnei Brak, was arrested after weapons were found during a search of his home.

Amir reportedly plotted the assassination for months with his older brother Hagai, 27.

They had planned eight previous assassination attempts, initially planning to kill Rabin outside his home in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Aviv, using a sniper's rifle, Israel Radio reported.

Among other offenses, Hagai Amir is suspected of attempted murder and illegal possession of arms.

He said in court that he had nothing to do with his brother's actions, and that his brother "was not crazy. He's mature and knew exactly what he was doing."

But Judge Dan Arbel rejected the idea that Yigal Amir acted alone, adding that evidence had been found of plans to commit other acts of violence, including car bomb attacks.

In a related development, security officials reportedly located two rabbis who had given religious justification for killing the prime minister.

Israel Television identified them as Rabbi Nahum Rabinovich of Ma'aleh Adumim and Rabbi Dov Lior of Kiryat Arba. Both men denied the reports.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau said it was up to law enforcement officials to determine whether the reports were true.

But if they were true, Rabbi Lau added, the rabbinate would convene a special committee to consider the spiritual and moral implications of rabbis' actions.

After his arrest, Yigal Amir said he had consulted with a rabbi before carrying out the assassination.

Canada criticizes Congress

CJN News Services

CAIRO — The United States' decision to move its embassy in Israel to Jerusalem is "inappropriate" and a bid to influence the city's final status, Canada's Foreign Affairs minister has charged.

Andre Ouellet says the question of Jerusalem should be part of an overall agreement between Israel and the Palestinians.

Just after the U.S. Congress voted to move the American embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem by May 1999, Ottawa said its embassy would remain in Tel Aviv.

Ottawa regards eastern Jerusalem, captured by Israeli forces in the 1967 Six Day war, as occupied Arab territory. Like almost every other nation, Canada does not recognize Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

Speaking here last month, Ouellet said he believed the American decision constituted "an inappropriate external pressure.

"The question of Jerusalem must be resolved among the parties and we do not approve of this kind of outside pressure," he said following a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

The week before, Egypt criticized the vote to transfer the American embassy to Jerusalem.

The thorny status of Jerusalem is to be discussed within the framework of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations on the final status of all land occupied in 1967, scheduled to begin in May.

Hotel rooms hard to find during Jerusalem 3000

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem 3000, a celebration devised by the city of Jerusalem to boost tourism, has proven so popular that hotel rooms may be hard to find during peak times in 1996.

"We believe that we will accommodate all those who will come," said Jonathan Harpaz, director of the Jerusalem Hotel Association, during a recent swing through Toronto and Montreal.

Festivities related to Jerusalem 3000 began last September and continue through September 1996. Many special events are planned, including massive pageants, artistic performances, exhibitions, conferences and festivals.

At present, Israel's Ministry of Tourism has registered some 8,000 hotel rooms, containing 16,000 beds, within Jerusalem. According to Harpaz, Jerusalem should have 12,000 rooms by the year 2000, in time for another historic anniversary of great importance — the Christian millenium.

As if that's not enough to keep planners hopping, a third milestone — the 50th anniversary of the state of Israel — occurs in 1998, right between these other celebrations.

The city's promotional kick for Jerusalem 3000 is also geared toward "the long-term effect," said Yossi Tal-Gan, director of Jerusalem 3000, who was also recently in Canada. "Even if people don't come for Jerusalem 3000, they might come in 1997 or 1998."

City officials are eagerly looking forward to welcoming talk show host Larry King, who is reportedly planning a Larry King Special telecast from Jerusalem in December. If hotels fill up as a result of such good publicity, tourists could stay in kibbutzim, hostels, even in hotels in Tel-Aviv, less than an hour away by car.

Five years ago, when then Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek proposed a year-long celebration to mark the 3,000th anniversary of King David's arrival to Judaism's most holy city, no one on the planning committee could have realized that Israel would be engaged in extensive peace talks with the Palestinians and the Jordanians.

"We'd been trying for nearly 50 years to come to peace talks with our neighbors, but no one knew five years ago that we would have these talks," said Tal-Gan. "The Oslo accord came as a surprise to all of us."

Since archeologists and historians have concluded that King David and the ancient Israelites conquered Jerusalem between 1006 and 999 BCE, the 3,000th anniversary could actually have fallen anywhere from 1994 to 2001.

The city itself is more than 5,000 years old, but it was never a capital for any people until the time of King David. As Tal-Gan points out, no other people except the Jews have ever declared Jerusalem as their capital.

Tal-Gan insists that Jerusalem's touristic success will not spoil the city by increasing its already notorious traffic congestion or enlarging its already sprawling suburbs.

"The master plan of the city of Jerusalem calls for a maximum of 700,000 residents and that's the most we can plan for," he says. Jerusalem presently is home to 600,000 residents.

El Al meets competition with lower fares, services

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"Please come in and sit down! You're right on time — just like one of our flights!"

Yona Nechustan, El Al's general manager for Canada, is proud of his airline's on-time performance level of 91 per cent, an impressive achievement in an industry known for its frustrating delays.

And he boasts that El Al, established as Israel's national carrier in 1949, is profitable as well as prompt. The airline took in nearly $1 billion (US) in total revenues in 1993, and has shown a profit in each of the last nine years — a troubled time for the industry as a whole.

El Al has added services and lowered fares to maintain its attractiveness in the Canadian market, which has become intensely competitive since Air Canada began direct flights to Israel last June.

"For the consumer, it's almost a Gan Eden," says Nechustan. "The airline is making less money."

El Al carries about three-quarters of the roughly 40,000 Canadians who travel to Israel by air each year.

The rest flew on a variety of European carriers before Air Canada entered the picture, according to Nechustan.

"We've had no change in our numbers since Air Canada began its service. In fact, last summer our numbers were the best of any summer in the last six years. We accept the fact that Air Canada has decided to start operating this route. This is according to the bilateral agreement between our two governments. We hope that their presence in the market helps to increase the tourism traffic."

To meet the competition, El Al has increased the variety of its in-flight meals, switched to using only top-of-the-line, wide-bodied 747-400 jumbo jets on its Montreal and Toronto flights, and started an advanced check-in and seat selection service for returning passengers in several major Israeli cities and hotels. Its new Loyal Traveller program, like the earlier Frequent Traveller program, rewards customers with points that may be exchanged for free flights or seat upgrades.

Nechustan, like all El Al pilots and technicians, was formerly in the Israeli Air Force — in his case, for 27 years, most recently as a colonel. Having served his country so faithfully, he notes that of the world's airlines, only El Al has remained loyal to Israel in good times and in bad. During the Persian Gulf War of 1991, all other airlines ceased flying to Israel, leaving El Al to provide Israel's sole airlink with the outside world.

And what other airline has such a distinguished humanitarian record? Nechustan cites the fabled Operation Solomon, also of 1991, which spirited thousands of Ethiopian Jews to the Jewish state from Addis Ababa. El Al has been crucial to the ingathering of exiles to the Jewish state since Operation Magic Carpet began transporting Yemenite Jews in 1949. The most recent arrivals include hundreds of thousands of Jews from the former Soviet Union.

Several major issues face Israel's national carrier as it adjusts its corporate ailerons to the current international tradewinds. Should El Al be privatized? The Israeli government has commissioned an American firm to assess the airline's monetary value in case it decides to go that route.

"I don't see any disadvantage to privatization, I see only advantages," says Nechustan. "Let politicians and governments govern the country, and let's not mix politics with economics. The task of a government is not to own companies; business people can do it better. But the decision is in the hands of the government."

Another dilemma is whether El Al, which presently services 47 international destinations, should fly to them on the Jewish Sabbath and Jewish holidays. Presently, it flies 302 days annually, excluding Shabbat and holidays, while most of its competitors fly 365 days to stay profitable. According to some studies, El Al is losing as much as $80 million (US) per year as a result of the religious restrictions to its operations.

"Some of our religious passengers — and God bless them for flying El Al — claim that from the moment El Al ceased flying on Shabbat and holidays, we started to make money," Nechustan observes. "That was in 1978. Before then, we flew on Shabbat and on the holidays, and we lost money. It's a tricky issue, and I don't know what the answer will be."

Whatever the airline's future, its on-board atmosphere is unlikely to change. The bustling conviviality that often pervades the passenger cabin is what makes El Al unique, Nechustan claims. "On what other airline can you see, from the moment the plane takes off, people who are wandering around, looking for friends on board? And as you can imagine, they often find them.

"Sometimes I wonder why such passengers have to pay for their tickets — they're walking to Israel, they don't sit on the plane at all," he jokes. "But we love them and we appreciate their loyalty to the national carrier. And we thank them for flying El Al."

Promotional ads blend the ancient, modern

TORONTO — Israel and Jordan have launched parallel promotional campaigns aimed at Canadian travellers, says the director of the Israel Government Tourist Office here.

"We are entering a new era in Canada," declares Ruth Ben-Tzur, citing figures showing that the number of Canadians travelling to Israel by air has already increased sharply in recent months.

One of Israel's proposed magazine advertisements shows a young couple, obviously enjoying themselves, drinking a toast on a beach; the caption reads "To Life!" Below them, a smaller photo shows an intriguing architectural detail of Jerusalem's Jaffa Gate.

According to Ben-Tzur, the ad reflects the Tourism Ministry's careful strategy to blend the contemporary and the ancient. The idea is to present Israel as the kind of sun-and-sand destination that North Americans crave in winter, not just as the historic, nurturing cradle of the Judaic, Christian and Muslim worlds.

"We are going to give Canadians a new product which they never saw before. Israel will no longer be presented as a place where people go only on pilgrimage, just for religious reasons or because they love Jewish sites or archeology.

"Now we can say very loudly that Israel is a vacation destination that competes with the best. We have the hotels, the food, the beaches. We're offering all these, plus history, plus archeology, plus culture, plus roots, plus a spiritual experience — all the things that are unique to Israel."

There has been "a revolution" in the number of Canadians visiting Israel, Ben-Tzur says, sparked in part by regional peace initiatives and by Air Canada's entrance into the Toronto-to-Tel Aviv travel market last June.

"There has been a 40 per cent decrease in airfares and the market has responded," she says. "There was a 43 per cent increase [in Canadian air travellers to Israel] in May 1995 over May 1994. June showed a 26 per cent increase over 1994." (Figures for July and August have not yet been compiled.)

Ben-Tzur says much of her job lies in showing Canadian travellers that Israel falls within a competitive price range for them.

"Travel is a product, just like any other product you see in the shopping malls. Consumers want to pick up the most attractive products at the best prices. They're looking for more value for their dollar.

"With Israel, we're offering a unique product and anything you want for your dollar you get — plus more — and that more is unique to Israel and the Middle East.

Regent offers Red Sea cruises

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Regent Holidays recently became the first major tour operator in Canada to offer Canadian travellers a Red Sea cruise from Eilat, with optional visits to Egypt, Jordan and Greece via the Suez Canal.

Sailing on the Greek Epirotiki line, Regent's Red Sea cruises offer something that was practically unthinkable only a few years ago: the possibility of using Israel as a hub from which to visit the neighboring countries of Jordan and Egypt.

The first cruise ship carrying Regent passengers on the Red Sea departs this week from Eilat. Depending on the itinerary, the various cruises drop anchor at such exotic ports of call as Aqaba, Jordan; Sharm'el Sheikh, Safaga and Port Said, Egypt; and Crete, Rhodes and Athens, Greece.

Regent began marketing Israel in Canada about three years ago. The company's latest offering is a strong indication of Israel's increasing appeal and affordability for Canadian travellers.

"Israel is an extremely good value compared to Europe, which is considerably more expensive," says Regent's Joanne Cothran.

Regent's 14-day Italian program costs about $3,200 in August. By comparison, the company offers a 13-day Israeli program — including return air fare, hotel accommodations, full breakfast, guides, entrance fees for all sightseeing, hotel service charges and local taxes — for $2,699.

"Not only are you getting a much better price, but you're going much further in air miles," says Cothran.

Like Regent, Sunquest Vacations of Toronto offers competitively priced packages to Israel that can be combined with sidetrips to Egypt Jordan and Turkey.

Four years ago, Sunquest became the first major tour operator in Canada to offer Israel-bound tour packages to Canadian travellers. At a recent tourism conference in Tel Aviv, Sunquest president Leo Desrochiers received an award from the Israeli government for the company's contribution to Israeli tourism.

"The Israel Government Tourist Office and our suppliers in Israel are very happy with our marketing efforts in Israel, because we've raised the overall visibility of Israel in the Canadian marketplace," says Sunquest vice-president Jill Wykes.

The company is proud of its expertise both in Israel and in Canada. Sunquest's Israel specialist, Ari Bauer, who is based in Toronto, is a former Israeli tour guide with 17 years of experience.

Both Wykes and Cothran agree that the most important component of the Canada-to-Israel travel market is not individual travellers but group tours. Both actively pursue Jewish groups, from charities to bar mitzvah parties, as well as the far more lucrative Christian pilgrimage market.

Although Sunquest had planned its own charter flights, the project never took off and now both Sunquest and Regent passengers travel via El Al. Canada's third major tour operator to Israel is Air Canada Vacations, which flies on Air Canada.

As they compete, the three companies have trimmed profit margins and improved and diversified their respective products. "All of the competition in the marketplace has been very good for consumers," says Wykes. "The effect on all of us has been to bring prices downward."

Israeli skater pays silent tribute to Rabin

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For one gripping minute, the sound of silence permeated the Harbor Station ice rink in Saint John, N.B., at last week's Sun Life Skate Canada competition.

Fifty-five hundred spectators stood spellbound as Israeli figure skater Michael "Misha" Shmerkin skated to centre ice, with a kippah atop his head and his hand on his heart, to pay tribute to slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Then Shmerkin, still in shock at the news of Rabin's assassination, skated a remarkable program that included landing five of six planned triple jumps. When it was all over, the spectators rose to their feet in an outpouring of emotion and gave Shmerkin a standing ovation. Some waved Israeli flags.

It was a remarkable feat — "the performance of a lifetime" according to one Saint John newspaper — but Shmerkin remembers very little of the actual skate.

"I put all my concentration on the performance and afterwards, I didn't remember anything," he told The CJN in a telephone interview from his home in Israel.

Speaking through an interpreter, Shmerkin said it was as though he was operating "on automatic," but thanks to his many years of figure skating and his experience of international competition, he was able to get through the event.

The judges evidently agreed with the thousands who applauded the gutsy performance, ranking him third in the free skate to go along with a third in the short program. Together, those scores were good for second overall, a silver medal performance.

A remarkable performance

It was a remarkable performance — all the more remarkable because at first Shmerkin did not even want to compete. When a friend told him just hours before he was to take to the ice that Rabin had been killed, Shmerkin didn't believe him. He raced to turn on his hotel TV set to confirm it for himself.

His first thought was to pull out of the event but Yossi Goldberg, head of Israel's figure skating association, convinced him that finishing the competition "in a special way" would best honor the memory of the murdered prime minister.

Goldberg, who visited Toronto after the Saint John competition, said he received the consent of Skate Canada officials for Shmerkin to devote a minute's silence in memory of Rabin. Israel's flag was lowered to half staff and Goldberg, who also serves as mayor of the northern town of Metulla, sat back and hoped for the best.

Shmerkin said that even though his free skate program is an enthusiastic and joyous one, "I couldn't smile. It was a difficult challenge because on the inside I wasn't happy, but I put my best face forward.

"I wanted to perform well for Mr. Rabin," he said.

Despite devoting his one-minute warmup to the tribute, Shmerkin not only skated well, he won the hearts of those at the rink and others watching on television.

"He took the silver in honor of Prime Minister Rabin's memory," said Goldberg.

Back in Israel, Shmerkin took to the Olympic-size ice at the newly expanded Canada Centre in Metulla to prepare for a meet in Germany.

Then it's back to Israel in December to participate in Skate Israel, the first-ever figure skating competition hosted by the Jewish state. (It was only with the completion of the new ice rink that Israel could offer to host such an event.)

In March, Shmerkin, an oleh from Odessa, will be back in Canada to compete in the world championships in Edmonton. There's even a chance he'll also visit Vancouver and Toronto for skating exhibitions. A performance in Vancouver was cancelled at the last minute due to the death of the Israeli prime minister.

Skate with the greatest for children's charity

TORONTO — It's your chance to skate with a hockey legend when Bobby Orr takes to the ice at Maple Leaf Gardens on Dec. 3 in the Bell/Bobby Orr Celebrity Skate for Easter Seals.

Orr will be joined by Don "let 'em go" Cherry, members of the Toronto Maple Leafs and other sports and entertainment celebrities in the afternoon skate to raise money for the children's charity.

More than $3 million has been raised for children with physical disabilities since the inception of the skate in 1980. Organizers are hoping to raise $300,000 this year.

Billed as a fun-filled event for the whole family, the day is divided into two skating sessions. From 1 to 2:30 p.m., participants in the corporate skate who raise a minimum of $500 in pledges will take to the Gardens' ice.

Skaters who raise a minimum of $25 in pledges can take part in the public skate from 3 to 5 p.m.

Pledge forms are available at any Bell Phonecentre or by calling The Easter Seal Society at 416-421-8377.

Buttons brings burlesque shtick

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — As he prepares to bring his recent smash Broadway revue to Toronto, stage and screen veteran Red Buttons, who is 76 and lives in Los Angeles, joked that he was contemplating taking French lessons just in case the Yes side won the Quebec referendum.

"I might even bring my wife along, and introduce her as a 'tres biyenta.' That's a French yenta, a tres biyenta."

Reached by telephone at his home, the former vaudevillian and burlesque trouper described the show that many New York critics and audiences found highly entertaining during its recent six-week run. "It's a history of show business from my 60 years of show business. I'll be talking about the old days. It's autobiographical and anecdotal, and I'll be talking about all the great stars I met and worked with — Al Jolson, Sophie Tucker, Jack Benny, Bert Lahr, Jimmy Durante, Gene Kelly, Bing Crosby ...

"If I have to say so myself — and I'm saying so myself — it's really a fabulous couple of hours in the theatre. For people who like to laugh, it's the place to be on Nov. 20."

Red Buttons

By and large, New York critics and audiences agreed. Commending his medley of Borscht Belt and burlesque shtick, New York Times reviewer Ben Brantley wrote: "For fans over 60, watching him must seem like reclaiming a long-lost cousin, all too happy to share memories of Shophie Tucker, Al Jolson and the days when good Jewish boys venerated their Yiddische mamas without apologetic irony."

Known for his red hair and impish looks, the comedian is often placed in a comedic firmament that includes Sid Caesar, Milton Berle and Red Skelton, for whom he admits he is sometimes mistaken. He has performed in 31 films and countless night clubs, and has appeared often on television in such shows as Friars Roasts, Knots Landing and Roseanne.

Mr. Buttons tells many tales and drops many names, and knows how to mine the rich nostalgia of a long show business career. He was born Aaron Chwatt in the "one square mile that produced the likes of Fannie Brice, Eddie Cantor, George Burns and Irving Berlin." His Broadway show was at the Ambassador Theatre — the same theatre where, 53 years earlier, he was on stage the night of the infamous raid on Minsky's burlesque show.

Red Buttons plays at the Royal Alex for one performance only on Mon. Nov. 20, 8 p.m. For tickets, call 416-872-1212 or toll-free 800-461-3333

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers should forward any questions to The CJN.

Maintaining the right attitude is as much a part of job hunting as sending in resumes and filling out application forms. There are many important attitudes to keep in mind:

Be prepared. Take control of your days. Pace yourself. Set a reasonable speed to follow. Schedule your time, set quantified objectives and follow through. Reschedule activities you missed out on. Being prepared will allow you to plan to include all opportunities.

Be balanced. Keep from letting yourself get too excited about opportunities. Don't see yourself hired for a job after being asked for an interview. I'm not saying don't be pleased with yourself, but you should plan beyond the interview. Look out for the job search activities and opportunities you will want to entertain after your interview is over. Not getting on an emotional roller coaster could be the best thing you do for your job search. Being balanced will keep you from becoming extremely depressed.

Be action oriented. Network. Go to job search centres. Seek out an employment counsellor. Talk to the contacts of your former employers, their suppliers, their competitors. Follow through on the actions you begin. Send out the letters you say you will send out. Keep track of everything you do in some sort of diary. Keep up your defined pace. Being action oriented will help you maintain your image of working hard at your job search.

Be goal directed. Focus on small wins. Be happy not only when you get the interview but when you accomplish something you set out to do — no matter how small. Recognize the worth and effort in yourself. Being goal directed will keep you aiming toward getting the job you want, or at least recognizing the type of work you should be looking for.

Be assertive of your self-worth. Say No if you have to. Be prepared for all opportunities you may have. Look like you care about yourself, both in your dress and in your deportment. Know what you are good at and be willing to talk about your strengths. Being assertive of your self-worth, above all, is important in being happy.

Be realistic. Say Yes if you have to. Know yourself and the marketplace. Be prepared to accept a position you may not have wanted to accept last year, if you believe the position is right in other ways. Recognize that you may need some upgrading, but do not count on education to get you a job. Being realistic may be depressing but ultimately will lead you to satisfactory employment.

Be open and receptive. Continually seek and analyze informa-

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Jewish Unity and Yiddish Literature: At this moment of turmoil and despair, the issue of Jewish unity is again at the forefront of our thoughts. Thus, it was most refreshing to hear the distinguished American Yiddishist, Prof. Itche Goldberg of the City University of New York, discuss Yiddish literature's famous triumvirate of writers, each of whom helped bring the Jewish family closer together a century ago, at a time when political forces seemed to be pushing us irreversibly apart.

It was Sholem Aleichem, Goldberg recalled, who said the easiest language in the world is Yiddish — you simply open your mouth and you speak it. But using Yiddish for literary purposes was another matter entirely. It took the combined geniuses of Mendele Mokher Seforim, Sholem Aleichem and Yitzhak Leibush Peretz to transform the everyday Yiddish vernacular of the Jewish masses into an elevated literary language.

Yiddish's three great literary patriarchs did most of their writing in the late 19th and early 20th centuries; Peretz died in 1916, Seforim in 1917, Aleichem in 1918. To mark the 80th yahrzeit of Peretz's death, Goldberg delivered a bilingual talk on Peretz in North York's Leah Posluns Theatre as part of the Jewish book fair.

What made Peretz (and, by extension, Seforim and Aleichem) so popular with Jews of every stripe? For one thing, he proclaimed the primacy of the people, seeing them as the enduring source of spiritualism and heroism. Peretz, like all great writers, identified with the common man. "Until that time, there was hardly a person who could speak directly to the people and tell them they were important," said Goldberg.

Peretz understood the economic and social conditions of the masses at a time when the rabbis had lost their sway, poverty was unrelenting and pogroms were bringing grief and suffering to Jewish hearts. Faced with all the problems of modernity, Jews were seeking to build a brave new world — "but they were giving up their contact with the old," Goldberg said.

"Peretz told them, 'Never mind creating a new world, we need our links to the past.' He showed the people that there was a certain heroism in the past, a certain life, a certain ethical basis. As early as 1891, he said that to come into the modern age, we needed to be able to appreciate the values of the past from whence we came."

After his talk, Goldberg was ringed with admirers and it took some time before Eye On Arts had the opportunity to ask him, for a start, about stylistic differences between Peretz and Sholem Aleichem.

Without missing a beat, the kindly, white-haired, erudite gentleman replied: "Peretz was more European than Sholem Aleichem, he was closer to the Jewish labor movement, the Bund, which came into existence in 1897. In a sense, his writing was more intellectual and he was more interested in the individual and in the alienation of his time. The writing of Sholem Aleichem did not possess the psychological insights that Peretz had already developed.

"Peretz depicts the individual from the shtetl, lost in the city," he continued. "He describes people and begins to understand their special situations. If Sholem Aleichem was closer to Dickens, you'd find that Peretz would be closer to some of the English writers, like a young Bernard Shaw, in terms of his awareness of social problems and psychological elements."

Among many shared traits, Goldberg said the three patriarchs believed in life and in the importance of affirming life, despite all of its problems, hardships and, yes, tragedies.

tion. Seek help wherever you think it may come from. Accept all offers for consideration. Being open and receptive will ensure you maintain your sense of self-worth and will let you know what you need to prepare for.

Finally, do not take your job search energy and pour it into some other worthwhile cause. The politics of the nation, the school and the family don't require more time of you just because you are unemployed. On the contrary, you require more time for yourself and your efforts. Put into your job search all the efforts you would put into any other activity where you seek excellent results and your results will be excellent. Remember the legacy Yitzhak Rabin left us. Decide on how you want to be known, and be that way.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Planes, Trains & Automobiles: On referendum night, otherwise known as The Night We Almost Lost Canada, it became apparent that the impromptu rally of some 150,000 Canadians in Montreal on Oct. 27 was an instrumental factor in saving this country.

Canadians who rushed to Quebec from New Brunswick, Ontario, Alberta, British Columbia and elsewhere in Canada have related heart-warming accounts of how federalist-minded Quebecers hugged them, cheered them, shook their hands and thanked them for coming. This heroic gesture on the part of thousands of ordinary Canadians renewed the vigor of the federalist forces within Quebec and is certain to be remembered, hopefully even celebrated, in history books in days to come.

On the Wednesday before the rally, Canadian Airlines Intl. announced special fares from many cities in Canada to Montreal for as low as $99 return. "We launched the fare initiative system-wide on all routes flying into Montreal," airline spokesperson Laurie Schild told Travel Talk. "We offered the unity fare specifically for people who were wanting to attend the rally in Montreal."

According to Schild, the airline had both an altruistic and a pragmatic motive in offering the cut-rate fares.

"First, our view on the whole unity issue is that we have always believed in a united Canada. Second, it was an opportunity for us to move some seats that would otherwise have gone empty."

Within hours, the airline's main competitor, Air Canada, was publicizing similar bargain fares to Montreal. "We decided to match the fare on a commercial basis," spokesperson Kym Robertson said. "That's quite similar to the stance that we've taken with most price initiatives that Canadian has made in the past. Clearly, our stance was commercial rather than political."

Although Quebec's chief electoral officer charged that the fares were illegal, both airlines stood their ground and had received no further complaints from the province at the time this column went to press.

Quebec Travelogue: The Monteregie is a picturesque region south of Montreal running from the suburb of Longueil to Lake Champlain and the U.S. border. The region consists of a few towns (the largest is St.-Jean-sur-Richelieu) surrounded by a gentle rural landscape that is broken by several dramatic massifs. Mont-er-egie means "the King's mountains" and refers to this series of five massive outcroppings. A sixth rocky outcrop to the north is Mount Royal, the mountain in the heart of Montreal.

One of the Monteregian hills, Mount Saint-Hilaire, features a nature reserve, hiking trails and sweeping views that extend to the Olympic Tower in Montreal. Part of the mountain holds a private preserve, partially funded by the Bronfman family, that protects one of the few original-growth forests left in southern Quebec.

Several other hills support sugar shacks where maple syrup is enjoyed in spring, and apple orchards where apple juice is fermented into flat or sparkling varieties of cider.

The region also features half of Quebec's 17 wine producers; the others are in the Eastern Townships. In summer, wine and apple-cider tours of the region are popular.

Fort Chambly, a reconstructed French fortress, offers a glimpse into history. The Richelieu Valley once possessed immense strategic importance for the warring French, British and Iroquois nations. The region, having once constituted the front line between New England and New France, went to the separatists in the referendum.

St.-Jean-sur-Richelieu is an industry-based town of 38,000, many of whom commute daily to Montreal via the congested Champlain Bridge. Since the late 1980s, a large shopping mall has drawn people away from the old downtown, which contains many empty and boarded-up storefronts. Last year, the PQ closed the town's famous military college.

"I don't know what's come over the young people," a retired francophone factory worker, who had lived his whole life in St.-Jean-sur-Richelieu, told me before the referendum. "I try to tell them that if only we could work together, Canada could be the greatest country on earth! We have everything! But they don't listen! They tell me to keep quiet, to keep out of it."

There are some excellent bed and breakfast hotels in the region. In St.-Blaise-sur-Richelieu, L'Epivent (514-291-3304), an elegant 1860s farmhouse of stone and wood, makes an excellent base from which to explore.

The Festival des Montgolfieres, a hot-air balloon festival, is held every summer. For more information, contact the Quebec Tourist Board, 416-977-6060.

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Margaret Florence Ludwig's 1975-95 retrospective of figures and landscapes at Gallery Louise Smith from Nov. 18 until Dec. 2, reveals remarkable scope.

Born in Peterborough, she frequently returns to the area from her Toronto home to paint familiar haunts, the swirling waters of Burleigh Falls, the well-loved terrain.

But now that her family is grown, she can indulge an urge to range the outer rim. In recent years she has flown, sailed, snowmobiled, even dogsledded, to remote reaches from Baffin Island and Greenland, to the Antarctic.

"I breathe better in cold air," Ludwig says, who gets her landscapes onto canvas on site whenever possible.

Far from the comforts of Forest Hill, she scrambles across the ice before a huge chunk where she was standing, cracks and floats out to sea; watches Inuit children at play; wonders at a soaring iceberg and a parade of whales. And she experiences the exhilaration of vast expanses in the pure air.

In her work she has also developed an affinity for figures. Her nudes embody grace and respect.

Ludwig's style, confident, caring, is both figurative and impressionistic.

A graduate of the Ontario College of Art, she also studied sculpture and graphics at Central Tech and York University. She has exhibited at solo and group shows and her works are in corporate and private collections in Canada, the United States and England.

Dear Susan,

After 25 years my husband and I have decided to pursue a divorce. We have three daughters — J 19, P 16 and R 13. How do we broach the subject?

Your first concern is quite properly your daughters. Ideally the two of you should organize a family meeting as soon as possible. It is important for you to deliver a unified message without apportioning blame. Reassure your daughters that they are not responsible for the demise of the marriage.

Your first meeting should focus on your daughters' feelings. You must give them the confidence that you can handle your own feelings, as well as theirs, without being overwhelmed. Stress that they should rely on each other for support in coming to grips with the situation.

Each daughter needs the opportunity to express any fears she may have about opportunities she will lose. They then need to be reassured that opportunities still remain, despite the change in the family. J. must understand that she is free to pursue her own dreams, even if that means leaving the family.

P. needs to be assured that she need not feel compelled to grow up too soon, and try to fill J.'s shoes, as well as her parents. She must be encouraged to pursue her own goals and interests.

Because R. is on the cusp of adolescence, the deluge of unpredictability she faces may cause her to see the task of moving to the next stage insurmountable, and she may be immobilized. Help R. make unpredictability a friend and not a foe.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 16 years.

Catalogue shopping for seniors

Active seniors often have difficulty finding clothing to match their lifestyle because most fashion outlets cater to the young and ignore the growing senior's market.

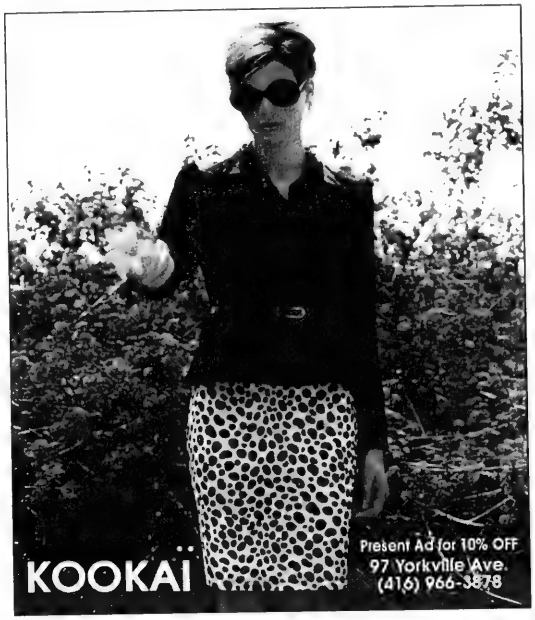
Now seniors have a choice. A free catalogue that makes it effortless for them to find clothes that are stylish and comfortable.

Published by Silverts, the country's leading supplier of clothing for seniors, the catalogue features fashionable dresses, sportswear, outerwear, footwear and special needs clothing for men and women. It's available across Canada by calling 1-800-387-7088.

Silverts also helps enhance the lifestyle of seniors with disabilities with a special line of clothing that uses such features as larger buttons, elastic waistbands and velcro fasteners.

Easy dressing sportswear for the arthritic, open back apparel and specialized footwear are some of the items offered.

Silverts is one of the largest mail-order source of clothing for seniors in North America and has other methods of distribution including a fleet of mobile stores across Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba visiting retirement homes, nursing homes and hospitals. The company runs a retail store in Toronto and provides in-home measuring for seniors and disabled people in the Metro Toronto area.



A little bit of Daniel Fiorio magic, and the woman at right is transformed into the woman above.

Fiorio turns beauty into stunning reality

By CAROL BIRKEN-WISE
Special to The CJN

Toronto hairstylist Daniel Fiorio has expanded his salon services to include a new makeover studio as well as a specialized team of hair, makeup and photography professionals. With this array of experts, your dreams of beauty can truly be turned into reality.

Fiorio is one of Toronto's most coveted stylists. His work has been featured in British Vogue, Toronto Life and Chatelaine. He is an active participant in the New York J. Gunter Color Show and the Toronto Guild of Hair Design.

"Through my 21 years in the business of making people look their best, I have experienced the joy of my clients after they have undergone a style change," says Fiorio. "There is a sparkle in their eyes and a happiness that permeates their expression. Opening a makeover studio was a natural evolution."

His makeover packages are priced at $180 including: makeup application, hairstyling and photographs. The photographs will use an innovative black and white technique that gives images a unique sense of warmth and depth.

The key to creating this look is an updated '90s version of classic sepia. Fiorio stresses that the results are not the "glamor" shots you find in shopping malls, but editorial-style portraits.

The challenge of a great makeover is having the ability to give women a look that not only feels comfortable, but one she can easily achieve herself.

Visit Fiorio's Yorkville studio and see your beauty dreams come true. What a great gift idea. For further information call 416-975-1935.

A notch above the crowd

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Michel Karkar, the owner of Michel's, a custom-made shirt company in North York, prides himself on the quality of his shirts.

"We consider ourselves a notch above the crowd," he says. "You won't find better quality workmanship."

He also guarantees his product. "If there's any problem within the year of purchase we replace the shirt for free."

Michel's does custom work for a lot of high-end clothing stores and has its own clientele — people call Karkar from as far away as California, Michel says.

Prices range from $110 for a shirt made from two-ply Egyptian cotton, woven in England to $220 for two-ply 180-thread cotton, woven in Italy. These shirts are well-priced because they are only about $10 to $20 more than factory-made designer shirts, says Karkar.

"We can afford to keep our prices down because we're working out of a warehouse space. We don't pay the high retail rents."

Karkar, 34, immigrated to Canada from Lebanon in 1988 and shared a downtown retail space with Stavros Fine Tailors, a made-to-measure suit company, until three years ago when he moved his business — he employs five tailors — to its current warehouse space.

"In a short period of time I have built up a large number of clients, which includes women, who respect the work I do," says Karkar. "Everything is made by hand-operated single-needle sewing machines."

He starts from scratch measuring clients — he'll go to peoples' offices and homes if necessary — and drawing up individual patterns which he keeps on file. Measurement and fittings must all be done by appointment.

It generally takes three weeks to get a shirt made, but during the holiday season it's slightly longer.

White shirts, solid or white on white patterns, are his biggest sellers. Most of his clients are business people who prefer traditional apparel, he says, adding that black is also very big. "We're doing more black shirts than ever."

According to Karkar, thin-striped shirts in the English tradition will always be in style, but not the "high fashion" Mandarin collar shirts. Button-down collar shirts have also declined in popularity, he says.

He recommends styles that will flatter his customers, he says. "If a customer has a wide face we don't make him a spread collar. It will make his face look wider."

Karkar likes the elegance of French cuffs worn with cufflinks, but this style is not convenient for everybody, he says. Seventy per cent of his customers choose the French cuff and 80 per cent have their shirts monogrammed. "The Monogram is a nice touch," he says.

Karkar says custom-made shirts may become hard to buy in the future. There are only four people left in Toronto who do custom shirts, two of whom are close to retirement age, he says. "Younger people are not interested in this business. They want to do things quickly."

The new Leality!

By CAROL BIRKEN-WISE
Special to The CJN

Ron Leal introduces his Premier Collection for "T.A.G.," The Apparel Group Ltd. The design philosophy is "maximum minimalism." Leal simplifies the design by stripping away unnecessary details allowing clothes to be worn in a variety of different ways.

A fingertip-length jacket tops jeans by day and a matching bustier dress by night. Think of it as the new "Leality," designs that slip into your wardrobe and effortlessly move from day to night, weekday to weekend. Defined by luxurious Italian fabrics and luminous palettes, Leal plays with color and texture, adding his innovative touch to classic silhouettes.

I recently spoke to Leal about his unique fashion ideas.

Question: What makes your designs different?

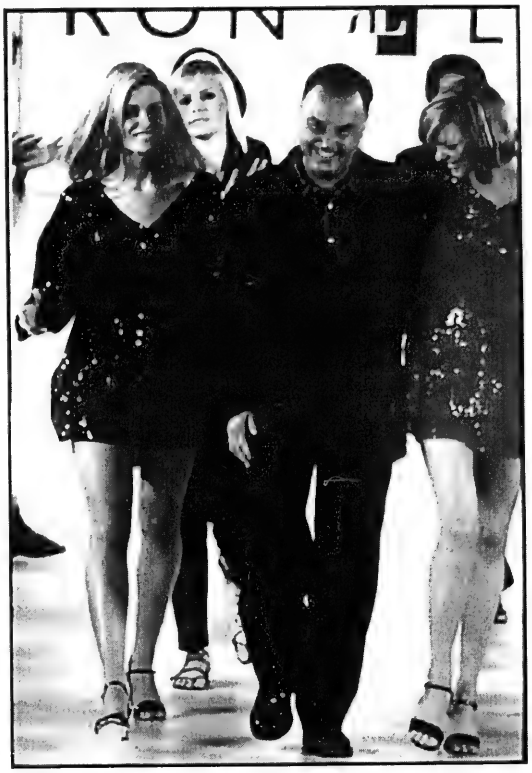
Answer: This line is a complete lifestyle collection, meaning that evening and casual clothes work together. For example, a sequined tank top can be worn with a pair of jeans or a pencil-thin pair of pants. Dress it up or dress it down.

Question: What kind of women wear your clothes?

Answer: There is something for everyone. Generally, the age group is from late 20s to the golden years. Women from all walks of life want to look beautiful with a little lustiness. That is what I do for them.

Question: What are the best and easiest colors to mix and match?

Answer: The base colors of your wardrobe should be black, navy, grey or brown. Any of your favorite colors will work well as an accent.



Ron Leal walks down the runway after a successful show.

Question: What inspired you to design your first spring collection?

Answer: Ava Gardner in the Night of the Iguana. She was cosmopolitan, sexy and glamorous, but there was still this sense that she had a little Virginia mud between her toes. She was loved by men and admired by women. Women today lead a multifaceted life, with work, motherhood and social life, they have to have clothing to suit their culturally schizophrenic lifestyle.

Ron Leal's fashions are available at Finishing Touches, Fred Green and Boutique Dita.

Native art in fashion

This collection of a Pinecone Long Laparka with beaver trim, Spirit Eagle sweater, turtleneck and gloves is part of the Laparka 1995 style designed by Canadian designer Linda Lundstrom.

Her latest styles incorporate the work of four Native artists including Maxine Noel's Spirit Eagle, pictured here.

Lundstrom has been incorporating Native motifs in her designs for the past six years and has recently begun selling her Laparka coats in the United States and France. She hopes the trend will help to improve relations with First Nations people in Canada.

The Laparka collection is available in nine colors, regular and plus sizes.

Andrew's prime destination for head-to-toe dressing

Maura at Andrew's: one example of the city's finest coat selection

With quiet dignity, a family of Toronto fashion pioneers has parlayed Hazelton Lanes' largest retail space into that rarest of modern retail birds: a clothing store that's not only emerged hale and hearty from the recession but is actually growing.

Through the efforts of son Darren Mason and daughters Beverly Lerner and Cheryl McEwen, Joyce Mason has seen the 25-year legacy of her Village Shop stores embellished and enhanced by the success of Andrew's, a world-class but serenely approachable shopping environment that ably represents the mall it anchors.

At 12,000 square feet, it sprawls invitingly at the entrance to Hazelton Lanes' west wing. Marvellously big for a boutique, yet wonderfully small for a department store, its distinct selection of sportswear, evening wear, outerwear, lingerie, accessories, fragrances and cosmetics has earned it an international reputation for quality and value. In addition to its Toronto customer base, Andrew's boasts a clientele from all over North America who make it their destination in a twice- or thrice-yearly buying pilgrimage. Their keenness is matched only by the buyers who shop the world over for the merchandise they seek.

This family – whose only business is fashion – subjects each potential acquisition to intense scrutiny: many pieces are called, but few are chosen. Armed with an agenda of quality and value to which they adhere unwaveringly, they "agonize over everything we buy, so hopefully our customers won't have to," says Darren. "Before we purchase an item, we ask ourselves two questions," he continues. "First, what inherent property does the item have that would make it interesting to a customer? Second, is it really worth the retail price?" A "nay" to either of these questions is enough to nix the purchase; only a unanimous "yea" grants it admission into a merchandise mix that Mason refers to as "focused." "As soon as you walk into the shop, you'll have an idea of what's in store for the season," he says. "Each display tells a story."

Listening to customers

That customers have responded to this merchandise mix is not surprising; according to Mason, "We really listen to our customers; the merchandise you see here is a reflection of their good taste." Enhancing the siblings' ability to listen is the fact that one or more of them is always on the floor serving their customers, who derive added comfort from knowing not only that the owners are in the store, but also that they love what they do. The same is true of their staff, many of whom have enough fashion experience to qualify as institutions in their own right: Carmen Marovas and Esther Perez in sportswear, Sylvia and Luba in lingerie, Judy Young in evening wear and accessories, Alice in coats (with probably the city's best coat selection at her command, Wonderland analogies are inevitable). Melanie Pichler, whose storewide responsibilities include marketing, typifies the Andrews persona: no titles to hide behind, just service to provide.

By buying selectively, Andrew's has avoided the pitfalls of overmerchandising: each piece has its own space and place. No need to dig for buried treasure: from a luxuriously wearable sweater by Ara to the stunning simplicity of a tailored black coat dress from Cattiva of New York, these gems are all at your fingertips.

Particularly impressive is the coat selection: from classic tailored pure wool coats through luxurious cashmere (including a real find at $1,200 that compares favourably with those selling elsewhere for $3,000) to fur-lined coats to sleek car coats, Andrew's offers a host of outerwear options.

Gaston Jaunet at Andrew's: many are called, but few are chosen

K.S. at Andrew's: one of many meaningful choices

Making every piece count

The variety for which Andrews is revered is a function not of more merchandise, but of making every piece count. "You don't create variety by simply adding colours," says Mason; "you create it by offering meaningful choices." Fifteen different styles of black pants and ten styles of turtlenecks attest to Andrew's' commitment to the basics.

An emphasis on wardrobe building — as opposed to updating — is part of Andrew's' long-range approach to customer satisfaction. "A blazer that works for you now should work five years from now," says Mason.

In every department – sportswear, evening wear, outerwear, lingerie, accessories, fragrances and cosmetics – service at Andrew's is more than skin deep. Five full time tailors are on staff to ensure a perfect fit for each and every garment purchased. Perhaps more important, you're treated with the kind of genuine warmth and respect that stems from people really liking what they do.

The Village Shop Plus: more of a good thing

True to the 25-year legacy of fine tailored sportswear, suits and coats on which The Village Shop's reputation was built, The Village Shop Plus offers all of these exclusively in sizes 16 to 24. Like its sister store Andrew's, which has inherited the Hazelton Lanes Village Shop's mainstream size offerings in a dedicated section, TVS Plus presents a welcoming front and offers the close personal service of seasoned professionals. The merchandise mix leans towards classic styles and clean lines, with an abundance of natural fibres. Precision of fit is paramount; TVS Plus clients have come to rely on the shop's ability to fulfill this need in blouses, pants, suits, jackets, and coats for all occasions. The Village Shop Plus has carved an important niche in a marketplace that up until recently often treated plus sizes as an afterthought to mainstream fashion.

According to Heather, the manager, customer response to the newfound availability of larger sizes which concede nothing in goodness of fit and style to their smaller counterparts has been extremely gratifying. She and her knowledgeable associates are well-schooled in the art of larger size dressing are on hand to ensure that what fits right also looks right. As at Andrew's, variety is key; the carefully crafted window displays are eloquent testimony to the manifold mix-and-match possibilities that lie within. Larger sizes and larger selection without style compromises mean more of a good thing.

Conway and Gower redefine dining elegance

The sumptuous elegance of the old British dining room is alive and well and living at Conway and Gower in the west wing of Hazelton Lanes. "Everything for the dining room but the food" is their motto, and they deliver on this promise in an inviting showroom resplendent with fine English and European china, crystal, Irish and French linens, oil paintings, watercolours and prints.

For as little as $10 or as much as $12,000, Conway and Gower has the perfect gift for anyone's home, including your own. Proprietor Hilary Jones is usually on the premises and has the expertise to advise you on your gift and Bridal Registry purchases. The atmosphere is extremely low-key, the service warm and personal. Gifts are wrapped, stored and delivered at no extra charge and can be delivered worldwide. To assist out-of-town guests, phone and mail orders are accepted.

As a further enticement for customers seeking a wedding gift, Conway and Gower offers 10% off all pre-wedding registry purchases and they give the couple a gift both on their wedding day and on their first anniversary.

If you're a fine china lover, you'll be happy to know that among others, Conway and Gower carries the esteemed Richard-Ginori line, including the elegant setting pictured above.

Combining the elegance of a fine china showroom and the warmth of a curio shop, Conway and Gower offers Hazelton Lanes shoppers the missing pieces to any dining-room puzzle.

Alan Cherry Bridal makes waves in Hazelton Lanes, draws ten-minute standing ovation at Le Parc

Christian Dior, exclusive to Alan Cherry Bridal

It happens occasionally at the theatre and once in a blue moon at a sporting event, but the ten-minute standing ovation received by Alan Cherry Bridal on October 30 at Le Parc may be the first standing "O" of that magnitude to occur at a fashion show in Canada.

Brides who've had the pleasure of visiting the new Alan Cherry Bridal Salon in Hazelton Lanes are clapping too. Once ushered into the palatial premises, they're treated to the considerable expertise of Vice-President Maria Arrigo, designer Nancy DiCroce and consultant Sabrina Corrado in selecting exclusive gowns by Christian Dior, Guy Laroche, and Helen Morley that are available in Canada only at Alan Cherry.

Directly across from the bridal salon sits Alan Cherry For Men, whose formal attire also wowed the crowd at Le Parc. Working in concert with Alan, associate Santo De Rose draws on a wealth of experience in assisting customers with their menswear purchases. The very latest men's fashions from Ferre, Lubiam, Marco Azzali and Zegna, among others – all hand-picked by Alan and Santo – ensure customers of the highest standards of quality, style, and value. As Toronto's better-dressed men have known for years, an Alan Cherry purchase is like money in the bank, and now that he's back in men's wear after a brief hiatus, his old customers are flocking to Hazelton Lanes to cash in their chips. Living up to his motto that "service at Alan Cherry starts where other stores stop," Cherry and his staff bend over backwards to enure that customers are satisfied.

"The Cherry Triangle"

Completing the trio of adjacent Cherry stores in Hazelton Lanes is the well-established and thriving Lox Stock and Bagel restaurant, where shoppers in and outside Hazelton Lanes converge to quench their hunger and thirst. Though some have suggested that the area now be called "Cherry Lane", Alan prefers to call it the "Cherry Triangle." Like the infamous Bermuda Triangle, he reasons, it "swallows up shoppers," but unlike its Bermudian counterpart, "once you're inside this triangle you'll never want to leave."

Carol Wise Reports on Fashion Gala at Le Parc

"Curtain Call", the very best of Theatre in Fashion Benefit Gala, delighted 1,100 patrons recently at Le Parc banquet hall.

The event was highlighted by a fashion show exhibiting the latest designs from Alan Cherry of Toronto.

It was a truly unique night of entertainment. The fashions ranged from leather jackets worn with blue jeans to extravagant ball gowns. The smashing finale was a gorgeous wedding gown, the model floating down the runway to the song The Impossible Dream – an interesting choice of music. Dan Duran of the Dini Petty Show introduced each of these items.

Jim Walton and Camilla Scott, the leading talent of the musical Crazy For You, did an exclusive and outstanding performance. Scott will soon be hosting her own talk show early in the new year.

The real reason behind this fabulous evening was to raise funds to support VITA (developmentally challenged individuals), Community Living Services, Cancer Research, Bereaved Families of Ontario and the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation of York Region.

My compliments to the caterer Italo Cellupica for providing a superb seven-course dinner.

Leading lady of Chez Catherine, Versace, Ferre, Krizia is no mere player on world fashion stage

Timeless pieces like this Ferre original make a visit to Chez Catherine and its sister boutiques unforgettable

Fashion is like the theatre," says Catherine Hill. "Each season you have to write a new script; each day is a new performance, filled with excitement and new challenges."

A quick "read" of her beloved Chez Catherine — the crown jewel of Hazelton Lanes — reveals a fashion script that the Bard himself could scarcely have penned better. Indeed, were Shakespeare alive today, his romantic leading ladies would undoubtedly be advised to "get thee to Chez Catherine" to fill their wardrobe needs.

From the fanciful to the austere, from the quietly distinguished to the utterly breathtaking, the one-of-a-kind couture creations found at Chez Catherine are indeed the "nonpareil" of the fashion world. And if one person can be at once a fashion icon, friend, dean and den mother to her customers and associates, then Catherine Hill is that person — flitting gracefully through Chez and its sister boutiques (Ferre, Krizia and Versace) with a warmth and wit that touches everyone.

On the fashion runways of Europe today, at Chez Catherine tomorrow

A fashion crystal ball

"I love what I do," she purrs. Her European buying excursions are "a thrill and a challenge. If I love something now, will my customers love it in eight months when it appears in the store?"

Season in, season out, the answer has been a resounding "Yes." Twenty-two years after Mrs. Hill hung up her shingle as a Hazelton Lanes original, Chez Catherine has endured and prospered as Toronto's foremost high fashion salon, apparently immune to the recession that has felled several worthy contemporaries.

What's the secret?

"No secret," says Catherine — "just loving what I do, working very hard at it, and surrounding myself with the best staff in the industry." Clearly, her feelings about staff are reciprocated: a decade of service on the good ship Chez is more the rule than the exception. At the helm, downplay her role as she might, it is Mrs. Hill and her exquisite taste and vision that have driven the business. For her, Chez Catherine is not a store to be filled up with merchandise, but an art collection to be upgraded slowly, lovingly, piece by piece.

Evening wear is a case in point: for bar mitzvahs and other milestones, the designer originals that grace her shop attract buyers from all over North America and beyond. Indeed, though many store owners can be said to shop the world over for their goods, it is also true that the world over shops Chez Catherine. For her clients, the question is not Will I find it at Chez, but How will I narrow it down to one dress?

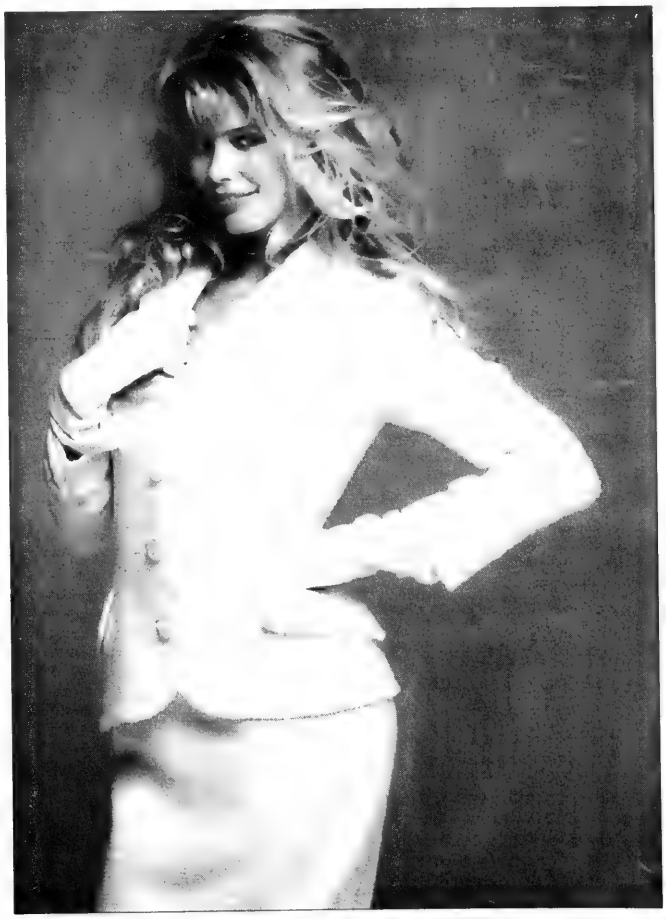
No less a victim of this dilemma than her customers, Mrs. Hill finds her love affair with each piece rekindled as she walks through the shop. Ultimately, that's good for business: who better to believe than another avid customer?

Versace, Ferre, Krizia

When Catherine's keen eye and foresight led her to acquire the exclusivity for Toronto of Versace, Ferre, and Krizia, she felt the only way to appropriately represent them was to create a signature boutique for each. With the designers' blessings, she proceeded to construct these boutiques in accordance with their worldwide design specifications. Each is an architectural landmark: Ferre with its yard-wide stainless steel columns, Krizia with its aqua-flecked marble floors, and Versace with its sweeping concave backlit screen wall. Each boutique houses the complete designer collection, including shoes, handbags, jewellery, and other accessories. If you love Versace, Ferre, or Krizia, a visit to Hazelton Lanes is the quickest route to the runways of Europe where their creations are first unveiled.

And then, of course, there's Chez, where it all started. Its gleaming criss-cross parquet floors dotted with oriental rugs exude warmth and beckon you thither. Once inside, you know you're in a special place. Even the most sophisticated fashion voyageurs who've seen the best of Milan, New York, and Paris agree there's no other place quite like Chez Catherine. The marvellous work of Karl Lagerfeld, Christian Lacroix, Christian Dior, Galliano, Rena Lange and other design luminaries tells part of the story, but it is not the whole story. There's an ambience here that exists nowhere else. Like a world apart, it sits cozily tucked away in the easternmost reaches of Hazelton Lanes' lower concourse. Whether you are there five hours or five minutes, you will remember your visit. Each piece that catches your fancy will remain etched in your memory, for here nothing is easily forgotten. The label may say Lacroix, Dior, or Lagerfeld, but it also bears the signature, in spirit if not in fact, of the indefatigable Catherine Hill.

Versace evening wear: stunning is an understatement



Leave it to Versace to bring out the best in a classic suit. Of course, having Claudia Schiffer model it doesn't hurt. Available exclusively at Versace, Hazelton Lanes.

Kika Boutique breaks new ground in design

In a stunning new boutique in Hazelton Lanes' west wing, a "new" Canadian designer is turning heads with a distinguished yet fanciful fall-winter collection.

Drawing on her experience in art, interior design, and fashion, Kika Misztela has married clean flowing lines with soft, pliant constructions and a host of innovative accents. In warm hues of champagne, camel, navy, cranberry, plum, chocolate brown, and hunter green, her collection features a variety of suits and coats that wear equally well to the office and the theatre. Prices range from $185 for blouses to $795 and up for coats.

The pièce de resistance is her signature wool/cashmere /angora coat (pictured above) that combines the functions of a coat, a cloak and a cape in one grand package. Dolman sleeves segue into a sweeping oversized cowl neckline that can be wrapped around the neck to ward off the elements. Each coat is individually sewn by a sample-maker, and the fabric is to die for. At $930, it may be the steal of the fashion season.

Closer to convention, Kika features a variety of striking wool coats to suit every taste. Raised collars add distinction to structured wool jackets, while the younger set will enjoy her smart, snappy short fitted jackets. Women of all ages will appreciate her skirt/pant that looks like a skirt but wears like a pant, and her luxurious pure cotton poplin blouses. They're typical of the line's ability to marry style and comfort. In a warm and welcome departure from the brass-band look, all buttons are covered in matching fabric.

By adding new twists to some classic designs, Ms. Misztela has chiselled a firm toehold in the Canadian fashion design community, and is a welcome addition to Hazelton Lanes.

The Spa at Hazelton an oasis of relaxation

Health-conscious women and men of all ages are spending thousands of dollars to remove a six-letter word from their vocabulary, but for a small fraction of the cost The Spa at Hazelton will be glad to banish s-t-r-e-s-s from your life for the duration of your visit and beyond.

The first thing you notice on entering the premises is how immaculate they are. Cleanliness borders on fanaticism here: "We like each customer to feel as if they're the first one to use the facilities that day," says Marketing Director Suzanne Leduc Aylen. To this end, each room, station and device is cleaned and disinfected thoroughly after each usage. Against a backdrop of soothing taupe, a staff well-versed in the art of genuine service and attentiveness makes a visit to The Spa at Hazelton a real pleasure.

Services include those you'd expect (hair, makeup, manicures, pedicures, facials, electrolysis, waxing, Swedish massage, and tanning beds) and some you might not expect (aromatherapy, shiatsu, and a full range of innovative skin and body treatments – such as breast and stretch mark treatments – designed to alleviate a variety of stress problems and related symptoms). Best of all, you can soak up this soothing scenario at prices that are competitive with just about anyone's. For example, haircuts start at $22 (men's), $28 (ladies'), and $15 (children's).

Increasingly popular are the Spa's day packages, which invite you to check your stress at the door and give yourself up to an oasis of healing.

For example, the "Day of Indulgence" (regularly $300, currently on special at $270) leads you on a six-hour magic-carpet ride of hydrotherapy bath with essential oils, deep cleansing facial, treatment pedicure with paraffin, light make-up, aromatherapy massage, treatment manicure with paraffin, hair shampoo and style, and spa lunch. This, or one of a number of other packages, is more than enough to make you feel like a new woman – or man, as many busy executives have discovered thanks to doctor's orders or a gift certificate bearing a subtle message from understanding family members, friends or business associates.

Located in the upper level across from De Femme and Avec Plaisir, The Spa at Hazelton provides a welcome respite from the rigours of big-city life. For anyone prepared to make even a small commitment to smelling the roses, this is a good place to start. Call 922-9226 for an appointment.

Avec Plaisir: lingerie with form and function

Elevating lingerie to an art form, Avec Plaisir's husband-and-wife team of Peter and Vasilia have for a decade offered "la crème de la crème" of lingerie lines to a discerning clientele that includes the likes of Jacqueline Smith and Susan Sarandon. Fabulous bras and panties from France by Lou and Christian Dior (not to be confused with the American-made Dior label); incomparable bras from England by Rigby and Peller (by appointment to Her Majesty the Queen – which in Hazelton Lanes means you!); luxurious bras from Italy by Verdonna and Christie's; sensuous daywear and sleepwear from Germany by Louis Féraud; and from Switzerland, the ultimate in soft, wearable natural fibre camisoles (wool, silk and cotton) from Hanro and Medima.

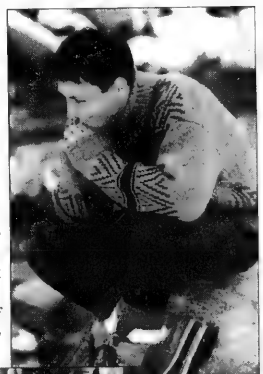
Though they carry the top brand names, says Vasilia, she and her staff are not slaves to any particular label. "Fit is everything. You may love the look of one line or the texture of another, but if it doesn't fit properly, it's useless." If your bras don't fit perfectly, you're in good company: according to Vasilia, fully 70% of her first-time customers are wearing the wrong size, usually because they've purchased at a store that lacks either the full size range or the fitting expertise or both. Avec Plaisir, on the other hand, carried sizes 30A to 44DD and thoroughly trains its staff in the nuances of bra fitting. And the few extra dollars you may spend on a quality undergarment at Avec Plaisir will be repaid many times over the life of the garment, says Vasilia. "There's a popular misconception that you can't get both style and substance in an undergarment. A quality undergarment offers both: no compromises. Beauty, support, fit, comfort: they all go hand in hand."

Lou of France at Avec Plaisir: style, substance go hand in hand

4 You's casual classics appeal to men of all ages

Some clothing lines subtly suggest that the wearer "Relax." Every once in a while, a collection comes along that shouts it from the mountaintops.

If you're the kind of man who likes to whistle as he works, "4 you" may indeed be For You. All the rage in Europe, this invigorating line is now available in Hazelton Lanes at North America's first standalone 4 You store.



With some 30 years of experience in better quality menswear, Franchisee Armand Elkaim says the line embodies "the casual, individualistic spirit that today's man needs as an antidote to the fast pace of life, love and the pursuit of business."

Prominently featured are richly-textured natural-fibre shirts and vests in warm earth tones of chocolate, charcoal, and olive that carry effortlessly from home and hearth to the great outdoors and back again. Easy to wear and approachably priced (shirts from $55, vests mostly under $100), all go well with jeans and give the line a universal semi-casual appeal that has allowed it to find favour among men of all tastes and all ages. For relaxing at home or at the cottage, or just tooling around town, it strikes a perfect balance between looking good and feeling good. Even the dressier ensembles, like a banded-collar three-piece suit with a tantalizingly asymmetrical pinstripe, breathe "Relax" from every pore.

Echoing these sentiments are vignettes from the 4 You product brochure, like: "Reach your goal, but remember to enjoy the ride," and "Many work so hard for their future, they don't live to enjoy it." Amen.

Jacadi There is something quintessentially French about Jacadi. It has that bon chic, bon genre feel of good French sportswear. Basically, crisp European style for the under-12 group. Great jackets and shoes, not to be found anywhere else. Particularly good for infant stuff, baby clothes, linens and glam baby gifties. Marci Lipman's fleece features fauna, fun, frolic Marci Lipman is living proof that it pays to love animals. Of course, having an artistic flair and a keen business sense doesn't hurt either.

One of the first to discover and nurture the demand for colourful fashion T shirts and sweatshirts, Lipman's transition from art poster designer to full-fledged fashion designer began with the release of her now-famous "Udder Delight" T-shirt. Little did she know at the time that her playful tribute to the holstein cow would set in motion a fashion phenomenon that has blossomed into an eight-store chain.

Marci Lipman's feel-good art will redefine your idea of comfort

From that single novelty item, the Marci Lipman line has grown to include a wide range of casual wear and sleepwear for men, women and children of all ages.

The two elements present in the original design – animals and humour – still find their way into most Marci Lipman creations. Each design is based on a piece of original art commissioned by Lipman, and most highlight aspects of the Canadian landscape and lifestyle to which we all can relate. An outdoorsy person who loves animals (and not just from a distance, as her two black labs – Smokey, 7, and Buddy, 2 – will attest), she draws on personal experience in developing the scenarios which show up in her designs. Sometimes droll, sometimes positively Thurberian, her work can best be classified as "feel-good" art. But it doesn't just make you feel good inside; the comfy/cozy 100% cotton fleece, polar fleece and flannel that are the mainstays of the line will redefine your idea of comfort.

Her Hazelton Lanes store is particularly popular among parents and grandparents shopping for that perfect birthday or bar/bat mitzvah gift. T-shirts and sweat shirts are perennial favourites, and with some 50 new items being added to the line each season, there's always something new and exciting in store.

New colors add to the old

Judit Reichlin, designer of the Divine Knits collections has assembled a glorious mix of colors, textures, and styles for her Fall/Winter collection.

Based upon the concept of "mixing and matching" new items blend easily with past seasons' colors to allow customers to build upon their existing Divine Knits apparel.

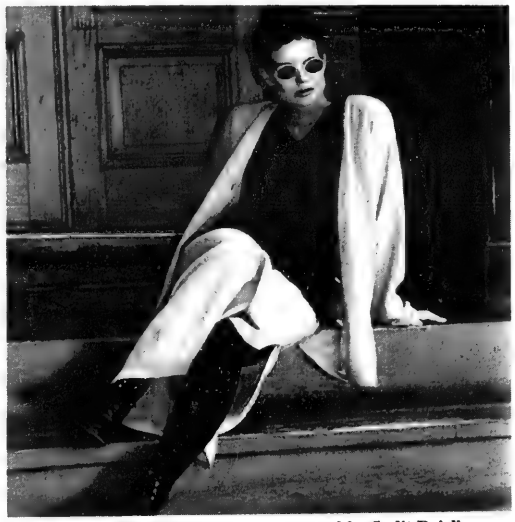
Headlining this season are four rich new colors and a variety of style options, typifying the quality, function and versatility that Divine Knits are known for.

The new palette of colors can be integrated with seasonless carry-over "base" colors of black, ivory, red, navy, taupe and oatmeal.. Fall and winter hues include stone grey, amethyst, bronze, and loden green.

For a stunning monochromatic look, layer a long vest over a fitted mock-neck sweater, with loose trouser-style pants and a jacket, all in deep loden green.

Add a bronze cropped vest or an amethyst cardigan that doubles as a jacket, to update combinations. Reichlin's innovative designs allow one garment to be a basis for many different looks.

Such a versatility, coupled with the advantages of 100 per cent cotton fibre make Divine Knits the ideal travel wardrobe. Garments may be easily packed without wrinkling, by rolling or folding into a suitcase.



One of Divine Knits' garments designed by Judit Reiclin.

Divine Knits seasonless garments are designed for a variety of occasions. A long cable knit sweater looks casual when worn with a slim knit pant and vest, yet can be easily dressed up for evening with a matching cable knit skirt, slit on one side. Styles are classic yet current, without conforming to trends.

Textural mixes are also a focus of Divine Knits for fall. Basket weaves, cable knits and ribbing are visually proportionate, allowing different textures to be worn together.

Yves Rocher ecology

By CAROL BIRKEN-WISE
Special to The CJN

I love my planet and I am learning to protect it has been the philosophy of the Rocher family for the last three decades.

A botanist and chemist by profession, Yves Rocher has always viewed ecology as a personal commitment. Growing up in La Gacilly, one of the flower centres of France, he began experimenting with plant extracts at an early age. He sought to 'unlock' the secrets of nature, to apply the essences of flowers, fruits and vegetables towards creating visibly healthier, more radiant skin.

Yves Rocher has the world's most sophisticated botanical laboratories which create the widest range of botanical-based beauty care products in the world. The botanical ingredients claim to create a visible change in the look and feel of the skin.

All products are non-animal tested and are known for their remarkable low levels of irritation on the skin.

Today, Yves Rocher is a household word among European women. The definitive alternative to high-priced brands, Yves Rocher connotes superior botanical beauty care with its high performance formulas in skin care, fragrances, make-up and body care. As a result, Rocher appeals the world over to all age brackets and socio-economic groups.

Yves Rocher is available through catalogue distribution with personalized phone service and home delivery. It is also available at the Bay. Yves Rocher will allow North Americans to experience the natural beauty care Europeans have known for years.

Beauty SHOP

By Carol Birken-Wise

As each sparkling snowflake is delicately unique in design, so is each person's face. We all possess individuality and natural beauty. The pretty snowflake's longevity is brief, but a healthy, glowing face can be a lifelong blessing. However, proper skin care and makeup awareness are essential.

Blistering winds and icy cold days are unavoidable winter elements that will likely make your skin feel tight and dry. Your cleansing regime should include makeup remover (cream or gel) followed by a skin toner. Use a richly formulated day and night cream as well as a treatment cream to nourish your skin. Exfoliate once a week to remove all dead cells. Don't forget about your hands; dried out cuticles are not only unsightly, they can be painful. Use a rich hand cream at least twice a day.

Keeping your skin in good condition will provide a great base for a successful makeup application. If you haven't worn foundation since last winter or if you don't wear it at all, it is time to start. Think of it as the foundation of your home. You don't need a lot of thick goop; a small amount will even out your skin tones and create a healthy glow.

Makeup for the winter months will be dramatic, fun and colorful. Lips will be your focal point and the choice will be yours. Whether you choose a vivid berry color or a '60s beige, you will be right in style. Your eyes will be second only to your lips. Keep them sexy with lots of taupe shadow and black or charcoal eyeliner. To modify this look, use a pencil eyeliner.

Below is a list of products that will help you put your best face forward:

SKIN CARE

Think of your skin as an artist's canvas and keep it smooth and flawless.

CHANEL, "Hydra Serum" is a successful paradox. It is a real hydrating treatment (contains 40 per cent active hydrating substances) which vanishes when applied, leaving your skin soft and silky. It can be used under makeup, alone or in association with other creams.

POLO SPORT by Ralph Lauren, launches "Face Fitness," the all-in-one skin fitness formula. This oil free, lightweight and fragrance free moisturizer will make dull looking skin look healthier and younger. Polo sport products are designed for men, yet work for women.

ESTEE LAUDER, "Time Zone Recharging Complex" is an ultra-light cream that rehydrates skin and improves elasticity, thickness and long term moisturization. "Time Zone Eyes" is a concentrated, liquid cream that helps diminish fine lines, puffiness and dark circles. It's a must! Every night!

BIOTHERM, "Biomains" is an anti-aging treatment which relieves dryness, protects skin from premature aging and strengthens nails. Its water resistant formula leaves your hands soft and smooth all day.

FOUNDATION

During the winter months, foundation is as important as your winter coat. It will protect your face from the cold dry air. It will also make your skin look healthier and provide a foundation for the rest of your makeup application.

ESTEE LAUDER, "Lucidity Light Diffusing Foundation" for dry and normal skin increases the skin's ability to retain moisture even after six hours. This silky liquid creates an optical impression of perfect skin through the diffusion of light. Coverage is adjustable from sheer to full.

ELIZABETH ARDEN introduces "Flawless Finish Hydro Light Foundation." This treatment foundation with the power of ceramides (strengthen and repair skin making it appear younger) is a lightweight cream-gel formula. It is fragrance fee, oil free, and has a satin finish with medium coverage. It is particularly good for women with dry skin.

BLUSH

For a natural, healthy look, apply blush in the middle of your cheekbone and just above your eyebrows.

CHANEL, "Powder Blush." This unique texture that is shaped like a bubble is at once silky, light and long lasting. It never streaks and applies perfectly with each application. Choose from a variety of natural shades.

ELIZABETH ARDEN, "Luxury Bronzing Powder" is the answer to the winter blues. Just a little of this magic powder and you will have that warm glow of the summer months.

EYES

Soft and natural or dramatic and sexy is what's on the winter hotline.

LANCOME, "Ombre Artiste" is a new way to wear eye color. This foam tip shadow pen releases smooth, waterproof color. It's easy to apply and stays on all day. Use as eyeliner or shadow.

CHANEL, "Basic Eyecolor." This all-in-one compact is perfect for all skin shades. It glides over your eyelid like silk while creating a soft and natural effect.

LIPS

CHANEL, "Quatre Levres Intense Lip Intensities" is an innovative compact containing four different textures, allowing different lip effects in a single color theme: matte, gloss, creamy and irridescent.

ESTEE LAUDER, "Pink Ribbon '95 Double Color Everlasting Lipstick" was created to flatter a wide variety of skintones. All net proceeds of sales go directly to support the Breast Cancer Research Foundation.

FRAGRANCE

LANVIN, "Arpege." A melody of flowers and woods, this original formula created in 1927 enhances women as music enhances life. Its scent is like voices in a choir succeeding one another only to combine in perfect harmony.

Shalom Chanel

Shalom, the new face of Chanel, enjoys a growing success in North America and especially in Canada, where in September she graced three magazine covers and over 60 pages.

Jacques Helleu, artistic director at Chanel, discusses his reasons for picking Shalom Harlow to star in the COCO perfume's latest advertising campaign.

Question: Why did you choose Shalom?

Answer: Shalom embodies intelligent femininity. As a ballerina she is particularly graceful and charming. Moreover she has better acting skills than some full-fledged actresses. But mostly we selected Shalom for her outstanding personality.

Question: Do you find any resemblance between Shalom and Mademoiselle Chanel?

Answer: The resemblence is striking. Since Shalom was selected to promote COCO, a fragrance created in honor of Mademoiselle Chanel, I thought it might be interesting to stress the many features that they have in common.

Question: This new COCO advertising campaign is very different from the ones you produced with Vanessa Paradis and Ines. Do these three "COCO" women have anything in common?

Shalom

Answer: All three have strong personalities that go far beyond modelling.

Winter Fashion

Casual looks with a professional edge

Modern dressing for work or play is based on ease and flexibility. With the emergence of casual dress in the workplace women need modern, casual looks with a professional edge.

"Key to a successful working wardrobe is a thoughtful mix of traditional weekend and business wear," says Michele Kestern, owner of The Casual Way.

The Casual Way's Fall/Winter '95 collection has a range of fashion options to meet every need. The newest tapered jackets and blazers are a simple way to update casual classics for "pulled-together appeal."

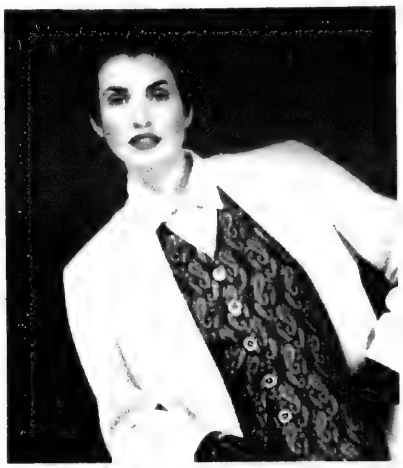
Jackets provide a perfect topper for leggings, wool trousers and knitwear separates and can be worn as an outer-wear jacket, as well as an inside blazer to compliment any style.

Plaid and classic tartans, pinstripes, tweed, houndstooth and checks, look especially new in blazers, long and short kilts and in trim. Colors follow classic traditions in charcoal grey shown with crisp white, traditional navy and burgundy. Fabrics are soft and cozy--cashmere, brushed cotton, corduroy and boucle.

Suits are must have for fall/winter as tone-on-tone dressing continues to be a strong trend; both functional and versatile, they can be worn alone or as separates with pieces you may already own.

For fun and an element of surprise, animal prints and zippers add a special touch in trim and function. To add a touch of sheen, look to the newest rayon sweaters and satin blouses.

Leggings in a heavyweight fabric with styled pockets or in novelty velvet or corduroy and worn with the newer, shaped blazers give up to the minute appeal – as do jeans trouser style or five-pocket slim cuts when worn with a blazer, vest or a silk shirt. A lightweight denim shirt worn under a blazer or on its own with wool trousers or a pleated skirt looks terrific.



Some of the latest designs available at the Casual Way (416) 481-1074.

Federations back Peres

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

BOSTON — Judging by the public pronouncements at the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations last week in Boston, the Jewish federations of North America have decided to take a public stand in favor of the current peace process.

Morton Mandel, past president of the council, threw the full weight of that body behind the policies of the government of Prime Minister Shimon Peres. "The only way to preserve the gift of Yitzhak Rabin," Mandel told the audience of more than 4,000 lay and professional community leaders who had filled Hynes Convention Centre on Wednesday night, "is by supporting Shimon Peres." Mandel's message was loud and clear: The silent majority will remain silent no longer. It was reiterated from the podium by other council leaders throughout the two plenary meetings.

The next evening, more than 1,500 people – men, women, blacks, Hispanics and whites, of all ages – gathered in Copley Square to join with the Brandeis University Coalition for Peace in "a rally to support the continuation of Yitzhak Rabin's (z'l) legacy of peace in the Middle East." The mass demonstration, with lit candles, lapel buttons, oratory and song, was fully endorsed by the Council of Jewish Federations.

After the rally, most of the demonstrators walked the few short blocks back to the convention centre to meld with the thousands already sitting in their seats to take part in what proved to be a moving, emotion-laden plenary session tribute to the fallen prime minister. Former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger eulogized Rabin, to whom he referred as his "colleague and brother," as "a visionary and a strategist" who had become "almost prophetic in the pursuit of peace."

"With every passing decade," Kissinger said, "Yitzhak grew bolder in his vision and almost biblical in his eloquence. He left a legacy of vision, strength and hope."

Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shochat promised the audience that the government of Israel would follow the late prime minister's three-pronged program of pursuing peace, expanding and developing the economy and encouraging the arrival of new immigrants. In his deep baritone voice, choking with emotion, Shochat urged the audience to "join forces with the government of Israel to root out Jewish radicals and extremists from within our midst."

"In the name of Yitzhak Rabin," he cried, "I ask you to raise your voices in your communities for tolerance, for pluralism, for democracy and for peace."

The keynote address was delivered by Peres. He spoke by live satellite feed to the thousands gathered in the convention hall and to countless other thousands of Jewish community activists across the continent.

A MEMORIAL OF CANDLE AND LIGHT

Thousands of people, many of them youngsters, daily come to the square where Yitzhak Rabin was shot just to quietly move around or place a memorial candle. The square has since been renamed Yitzhak Rabin Square. [RNS photo]

A question of responsibility

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — A Canadian-born rabbi who heads a yeshivah near Jerusalem, has been accused by a fellow rabbi of indirect responsibility in the murder of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Rabbi Nahum Rabinovitch, who was born in Montreal, heads the Birkat Moshe yeshivah in Ma'ale Adumim. He has come under fire for comments which critics say may have furnished the killer with a religious justification for his act.

Rabbi Rabinovitch, who headed North York's Clanton Park synagogue before moving to Israel in 1971, vigorously denies the charges, calling them "lies and blood libel."

The accusations were made by Yoel Bin-Nun, a rabbi from the West Bank settlement of Ofra, who is spearheading a struggle to weed out extremist rabbis from the religious camp in the aftermath of the Rabin murder. Bin-Nun calls his campaign an urgent exercise in soul-searching, but right-wing critics call it a witch-hunt.

Rabbi Bin-Nun stunned the religious establishment two weeks ago when he threatened to reveal the names of several rabbis who provided Rabin's killer with religious arguments that may have given him the green light. The media leaked two names that Bin-Nun reportedly passed on to Israel's chief rabbis; one of them was Rabbi Rabinovitch's

Rabbi Bin-Nun never confirmed the names publicly, but during a radio show last week, he accused Rabinovitch of bearing "indirect

CANADA

Kosso Eloul Dies

TORONTO — Internationally acclaimed sculptor Kosso Eloul died here earlier this month of heart failure. He was 75.

Eloul's work was known around the world, but perhaps his most important sculpture is the eternal flame at Yad Vashem.

He was born in Russia and grew up in Israel, where he co-founded an artists' movement known as New Horizon. He moved to Toronto in 1964.

He has some 44 pieces on public display in the Toronto area.

BBC Hotline

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights has established a national hotline to monitor and report hate crimes and harassment.

Individuals of all ethnic backgrounds, religions, sexual orientation and national origin may use the toll-free hotline to report threats, graffiti, violence and other incidents.

The number is 1-800-892-BNAI (1-800-892-2624). In Toronto, call 416-633-3692.

Pollard Web Site

TORONTO — Citizens for Justice for Jonathan Pollard Canada have announced a new Web page on the Internet, said to be fully authorized by the imprisoned spy for Israel and his Toronto-based wife, Esther.

The page is located at: http://pages.prodigy.com/ON/andyweb/pollard.html

JNF Shaliach Departs

HAMILTON — After three years here as Jewish National Fund emissary to the communities of southwestern Ontario outside Toronto, Yoram Gordon has returned to Israel.

The community recently bid him farewell with an Oneg Shabbat at Temple Anshe Sholom, which was attended by about 200 guests.

Gordon ascribed his success in London, Windsor and Kingston to the fact that he became "part of the community and involved in everything that was going on."

New JNF President

WINNIPEG — Norm Vickar is the new president of the Manitoba and Saskatchewan regions of the Jewish National Fund, succeeding Earl Pitch.

Vickar is a former Saskatchewan cabinet minister and former mayor of Melfort, Sask.

ISRAEL

'Too Much Security'

JERUSALEM — Knesset members last week complained that security measures have become too tight.

"The exaggerated security measures we have been subjected to are reminiscent of a South American banana republic," Yossi Katz of Labor told his party's executive meeting.

Since the murder of Yitzhak Rabin, security people have been following even relatively unlikely targets in the government.

"We've gone from one extreme to the other," Katz said.

Police Minister Moshe Shahal said the steps are necessary.

Rabin Stamp

JERUSALEM — A stamp commemorating the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin will be issued a month after his death.

Israel's Postal Authority said the stamp would bear Rabin's official photograph and would be issued in a five-shekel denomination.

Communications Minister Shulamit Aloni said that stamps in memory of prime ministers are usually issued on the first anniversary of their death.

But in light of the circumstances surrounding Rabin's death, she added, it was decided that a stamp in his honor should appear sooner.

Israel's Population

JERUSALEM — Israel's population may top six million by the year 2000 if current growth rates continue, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The population last year stood at 5.6 million, with 81 per cent comprised of Jews.

The total grew by 140,000 people, similar to the growth rates in 1993 and 1992.

Portuguese Visit

JERUSALEM — The president of Portugal addressed a special session of the Knesset this month during a four-day official visit to Israel.

Mario Soares praised Israeli and Palestinian leaders for their progress on peace.

Soares also asked forgiveness from Jews for Portugal's involvement in the Inquisition.

WORLD

Rabbi New President

NEW YORK — Toronto-born Rabbi Sheldon Zimmerman has been chosen the new president of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JIR), the Reform movement's four-campus university and professional development centre.

He succeeds Alfred Gottschalk, who will become chancellor after heading HUC-JIR for 25 years.

Rabbi Zimmerman is currently the spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El in Dallas, Texas. Prior to that, he served as assistant and later senior rabbi at New York's Central Synagogue.

Paraguayan Promise

WASHINGTON — At a recent meeting here with officials of B'nai B'rith, the president of Paraguay, Juan Carlos Wasmosy, said it's time to open his country's long-locked files on Nazi war criminals.

"Over the years, Paraguay has been seen as a haven for Nazi war criminals," said Sidney Clearfield, executive vice-president of B'nai B'rith. "This is a positive step forward."

Polish Appointment

WARSAW — Poland has appointed Krysztoff Sliwinski to the newly created post of Plenipotentiary of the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Poland for Contacts with the Jewish Diaspora.

A former Polish ambassador to Austria, Sliwinski will deal with such issues as reparations to Jewish institutions, individual Jews and their estates in Poland and abroad, for properties lost during the war. He also will serve as a cultural attache, representing Poland to the Jewish world, and vice versa.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

This has been a tradition in our family for four generations.

Peace is Jewish people's 'moral choice': Peres

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The unity of Jerusalem, Israel's security and the West Bank are the three major concerns left to be addressed in the ongoing peace process, says Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

Peres was speaking to the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Boston via satellite feed from Jerusalem. The feed was relayed to other federations throughout the United States and Canada, including Toronto.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto invited community leaders to hear the speech at the Lipa Green building, where about 100 attended.

Jerusalem, Peres said, is "excluded as an issue" in the peace negotiations. "We do not intend to compromise on Jerusalem. It was never a Palestinian or an Arab capital. But the Jewish people never had any other."

There will be no dismantling of the settlements on the West Bank, he promised.

"The problem [there] is not the existence of the settlements or the number of settlers," he said. Rather, Jews and Arabs must learn to get along with each other. "If there is a different rapport, their relationship will not be a problem."

Israeli forces will be redeployed from Judea and Samaria in areas "where there is a concentration of Palestinian life, which is not more than 27 per cent of the West Bank," before Christmas, in accord with Oslo 2.

Israel, however, "will be careful to keep what is needed for our future," he said. "From the Jordan River to the Mediterranean, there will be no other army. The security [of Israel] will be in the hands of Israeli military forces."

Gaza is already run by the Palestinians. "We didn't give it up — it was never in our hands."

Peace, he said, is "a moral choice — a Jewish choice. We don't want to govern another people against their will."

The search for peace with Syria must go ahead "in terms of sheer logic," Peres said.

"If we reach a peace with Syria, we will insist all Arab leaders (except maybe the crazy ones like Libya) will come together at the river of Damascus and say, 'This is the end of war; this is the beginning of peace; this is the end of the mobilization of our youngsters for war.' "

Aliyah must be encouraged, he said, "not because it is hard to live elsewhere, but because it is so positive to live where Jewish tradition is a reality."

He warned, "We can't keep together unless we can respect the rules, laws and manners of a democratic society. There is no unity without democracy and no democracy unless we accept the will of the electorate."

Speaking in Boston, Avraham Shahat, minister of finance and a close friend of slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, said assassin Yigal Amir "didn't act in a vacuum. He emerged from a radical fringe element that breeds fanatics and killers."

Amir "had the support of groups who said that Rabin was a killer, a Nazi a traitor," Shohat said, charging that "the man who pulled the trigger was given ammunition by a small number of fanatic groups in Israel and the United States."

Jews have not understood the danger of such people, he said. "As a representative of the government of Israel, I ask you to join us in rooting out these radicals."

Also in Boston, an emotional Henry Kissinger spoke of Rabin as a visionary, a strategist and an analyst, who in his last years "achieved an almost biblical eloquence."

Peres echoed these remarks, saying he had never seen Rabin as happy as in his last few days.

He invited Jewish leaders to come to Israel to mark the shloshim of Rabin's death.

Sharing ideas

The annual General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations was held last week in Boston. When one includes the numbers of volunteers who helped to facilitate the proceedings and who assisted the 4,000 delegates to find their way, literally, through the proceedings, it is likely that almost 5,000 people took part in the assembly.

Delegates could choose to participate in the lectures and workshops of only one of four different subject areas. Euphemistically, organizers called each of these different subject areas institutes. They were: financial resource development, Jewish identity and continuity, public social policy/human services, and Israel-Diaspora relations. In each institute, speakers of renown and expertise led the discussions.

Not surprisingly, with so many similar-minded, highly individualistic people thrown together to talk, reflect, share ideas, exchange views, learn and argue, the level of energy and enthusiasm at the meetings was high. It spilled out of the meeting rooms into the hallways. It was palpable in conversations in workshops and even in coffeeshops. There was a sense among delegates that there was much work to be done but given demographic trends, financial difficulties, communal divisions, and religious tensions, not much time in which to do it.

And yet, despite the energy and the enthusiasm emanating from the thousands of people who mingled together in close contact for a handful of days in Boston, the proceedings were unmistakably influenced most by one key person who was not there: Yitzhak Rabin.

Many readers may be unfamiliar with the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF). Some background information therefore may be helpful.

The Council of Jewish Federations was created in 1932 as an umbrella organization for the Federation movement. The first Jewish federation began in 1895, 100 years ago in Boston. Five agencies - an orphanage and home for the aged, a general relief organization, an employment bureau, a women's service organization, and a free burial association - joined forces to form the first federation, the Federation of Jewish Charities. The central body made decisions on financing and planning while respecting the autonomy of the agency that actually provided the service to the needy. This was the prototype federation. It quickly became a model for other communities.

Today, there are 189 Jewish federations in North America representing most Jewish populations centres with 1,000 people.

As most people know, federations have a mandate that reaches in two directions, locally, to assist the needy at home and externally, to assist the needy in Israel and in other parts of the world. According to Council literature, nearly $800 million (U.S.) is raised in annual contributions to federations, with endowment funds and capital and special campaigns pushing the total to over $1.1 billion.

The Council of Jewish Federations of Canada (CJFC) came into being January 17, 1993 in a reorganization of two existing national organizations. It has representation on the CJF Board of Directors. In effect, it is a smaller umbrella within the larger North American one (CJF).

The CJFC includes three types of members: federated communities, affiliated communities and certain agencies.

The cities with federated Jewish communities are: Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, London, Ottawa, Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Windsor, and Winnipeg. These communities represent more than 90 per cent of the 365,000 Jews who live in Canada. Affiliated communities, including the four Atlantic provinces and Saskatchewan, comprising approximately 4,000 Jews, are represented by two regional councils. The major agencies which fall within the CJFC umbrella are Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, and The Canada-Israel Committee.

For the benefit of the many Canadians attending the Assembly who were interested in public social policy issues, the CJFC arranged for learning sessions with uniquely Canadian perspectives on social policy issues. The list of speakers for the various sessions was indeed impressive. Unfortunately I could attend only the session which focused on the Jewish communal response to the inevitable reductions in provincial and municipal contributions to Jewish community agencies.

The leader of the session was Elaine Todres, Deputy Solicitor General for Ontario. Although she prefaced her presentation by stating she was appearing only in her personal capacity and not as a civil servant, Ms.Todres brought to the inquisitive group the benefit of her strong ability to communicate, engaging elan and varied experience at Queen's Park.

Her conclusions were clear but not comforting. She stated that we are at a crossroads in the delivery of Jewish services to the needy. All our assumptions have to be changed to accommodate both the changing funding policies of the public sector and the diminished funding capabilities of private individuals. The community must decide upon its hierarchy of needs and then, upon a strategy for fulfilling them.

One assumption however, Todres eloquently emphasized must not be changed. It is the core value and the chief purpose underlying the very existence of all Jewish federations wherever they exist: the duty to help the needy. "Tzedaka is an issue of mitzvah, of obligation; it is not an issue of personal motivation." In these uncertain times, it was a timely personal reminder. - MBD

Fanatics and doves lead conflict in Mid-East, Israeli peace activist, writer says

By BARABARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The conflict in the Middle East has evolved from a clash between Jews and Arabs to one between "fanatics" and doves, says Amos Oz, one of Israel's foremost writers and peace activists.

Oz last week delivered the inaugural Rabbi Stuart and Hadassa Rosenberg memorial lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation, where Rabbi Rosenberg served as senior rabbi from 1956 to 1972.

"The fanatic's sense of identity depends on the existence of an enemy," Oz told the audience of 750. "They need an enemy to feel good."

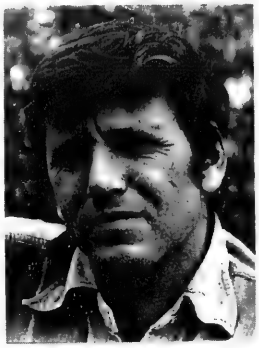
He described the fanatics as "a Jewish Hezbollah" who advocate an "Iran-like theocracy," and he called for their "excommunication."

"The settlers on the West Bank — the right wing — are just as shocked and bewildered [by Yitzhak Rabin's death] as the rest of Israel. The right wing are just as threatened by fanatic groups."

Quoting Leah Rabin, Oz said, "A peace-oriented silent majority in Israel will no longer be silent."

Oz said he watched with admiration as Rabin changed from a "reasonable hardliner," who worried about security, to a peace advocate who tried to obtain a compromise between "two historic enemies, two deadly foes."

The Palestinians developed a sense of nationhood by way of Zionism, Oz said, and Rabin acknowledged their national aspirations.



Amos Oz

Oz views peace as a compromise whereby everyone gets some, but not all, of what they want. "Compromise is synonymous with life itself. The opposite of compromise is death, fanaticism."

The clash between Israelis and Palestinians is not a matter of misunderstanding, he said. "The Palestinians want the same land [as we do]. The conflict is perfectly understandable — two nations claiming the same land."

He stressed that Palestinians and Israelis can never live together because there's been "too much bad blood." It's like a divorced couple choosing to live in the same house, he said. Each side can take a bedroom, "but special arrangements have to be made for the kitchen and the bathroom."

Oz does not advocate peace at any price; he expects Yasser Arafat to withdraw the clause in the PLO covenant that calls for the destruction of Israel.

"I may be a political dove, but I'm not a fool. Either they amend the charter or there's no business."

He acknowledged that his vision of peace is not a popular one, adding diversity is the beauty of Israel. It is common for Israelis to argue and debate with one another on a range of subjects, Oz said.

Some people have predicted the outbreak of a civil war in Israel, but he disagrees. "It's been going on for years," he said. "We inflict ulcers and heart attacks on each other... It's relatively civilized."

Oz likened the clash between Israelis and Palestinians to a Greek tragedy with two possible endings. "A Shakespearean [type] with a stage littered with bodies or a Chekhovian [one] where everybody is melancholy, disappointed — but alive," he said.

"I'm trying to find a Chekhovian resolution for Israel."

Gun control lobbyists honored by JWI

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The co-founders of the Coalition for Gun Control were recently honored by Jewish Women International of Toronto at its 39th annual Covenant Breakfast.

Wendy Cukier and Heidi Rathjen were named Women of the Year, in recognition of their work promoting gun control, and for the part they played in influencing the Liberal government to introduce Bill C-68, currently before the Senate, which contains all the measures advocated by the coalition.

Anna Bloom, Women of the Year chair, said Cukier was a professor at Ryerson Polytechnic University and Rathjen an engineering student at l'Ecole Polytechnique when 14 women students at l'Ecole Polytechnique were shot and killed on Dec. 6, 1989.

"Shocked by the massacre, Wendy, in Toronto, decided to do something about gun control ... She talked to her friends and colleagues and found like-minded people who were the nucleus for Coalition for Gun Control.

"In Montreal, Heidi felt anger and frustration and started circulating a petition asking the government to ban assault weapons. Wendy heard about Heidi, and a relationship began that led to the formation of the Coalition for Gun Control."

Bloom said both women have crossed the country speaking to such groups as the press, civic leaders and police associations.

"They began to amass support which now includes more than 300 organizations ranging from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police to hospitals, universities, boards of education and women's organizations.

"Heidi and Wendy have used their personal money and every spare moment to spread the work of the coalition ... They have received threatening phone calls and letters and have been shouted down and insulted. They have even been called Nazis — a strange epithet considering Wendy is the daughter of a Holocaust survivor."

The women have been recognized for their work, however, and were awarded the 1992 prize of the

Wendy Cukier

Heidi Rathjen

International Association on Violence and Coexistence, a civilian citation from Ottawa Police Services. As well, in 1992, they were named among the Women of the Year by Chatelaine magazine and in 1993, Cukier received a Canada 126 medal for her volunteer activities on gun control.

Cukier said the killings at l'Ecole Polytechnique offended her sense of Canada as a peaceful country, but when she learned how easy it had been for killer Mark Lepine to obtain the rifle he used, the focus of her anger changed.

"I just couldn't believe we knew more about dog owners than gun owners," she said. "I would have joined an organization to fight for gun control, but there wasn't one. So I started one."

Two Heritage Front members get 30-day jail sentence

TORONTO — Two members of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front were sentenced to 30-day jail terms here last week for their part in an assault on a fellow member.

Erick and Elcar Fischer pleaded guilty to assaulting Tyrone Mason in 1993. They had faced charges of kidnapping, threatening and forcible confinement.

Court heard that the Fischers, who are brothers, offered a ride to Mason, who was later bound, choked and threatened in the car. The Fischers had accused Mason of stealing a computer list of Front members' names and addresses.

Mason was later treated in hospital.

The brothers each received 30-day sentences, to be served intermittently, and were placed on probation for two years. They are also prohibited from possessing firearms or explosives for 10 years.

Beth Tikvah Synagogue Celebrates Jerusalem 3000

CLASSES
November - December

Archeological Perspectives with a Historic Bent
Professor Menacham P. Maidman of York University will speak on Monday nights
Sessions begin at 8:00 p.m.

November 27 - Jerusalem Before the Israelites
This lecture describes the first appearance of Jerusalem in history and the world of which it was part. This look at Jerusalem as seen from the outside also considers whether there may be traces of the Israelites in the region even at this early period.

December 4 - Jerusalem and the United Kingdom (David and Solomon)
Jerusalem, at its earliest appearance in Jewish history, is already a powerful religious and national symbol. This lecture traces the meaning of Jerusalem in the tenth century B.C.E. and contemporary evidence for its history.

January 15 - The Capital of Judah in a Wider World
As the capital of the southern kingdom of Judah, Jerusalem became involved, often violently, in the international politics of an imperial age. This lecture focuses on Jerusalem and Judah as seen in Asyrian and Babylonian eyes.

January 22 - Jerusalem Under Foreign Rule: Persia, Syria, Rome
Between the destruction of the First and Second Temples, Jerusalem was the centre of Jewish national life, even under foreign political rule. The different regimes imparted to Jerusalem different and enduring characteristics.

Members - free Non-member - $5.00

A Study of Early Zionism, its Leaders and Participants
Jerry Ziedenberg will present videos on four Thursday evenings at 8:00 p.m., followed by a group discussion on several of the seminal figures in Israel's history. By examining the lives and times of these men, we can better understand the Israel of today.

Jerry is a synagogue member who has done extensive research on the heros of Israel.

Group's Kavannah is for Jewish spiritual renewal

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Four years ago, Shelley Duke attended a weekend Shabbaton at a Jewish renewal community in Ashland, Ore.

But she found the Jewish environment so physically and spiritually healing, she says, that she stayed six months.

When she returned to Toronto, Duke became the founding director of Kavannah: a Network for Jewish renewal.

Kavannah, which in Hebrew means the underlying intent sponsors special events to foster Jewish renewal and spiritual growth. On Dec. 2 it will hold Beyond Havdallah at 7:30 p.m. at the Bloor JCC, which is co-sponsoring the farbrengen-style evening of learning and song with noted author and teacher Arthur Kurzweil.

Shelly Duke

Kavannah is affiliated with the Network of Jewish Renewal Communities — there are approximately 23 in North America — whose roots are in traditional Jewish sources like Torah and Kabbalah. But followers may also incorporate practices of other spiritual traditions such as yoga and meditation.

Kavannah also takes part in the annual Canadian-American Chavurah Weekend in June, which is usually held near Buffalo.

Duke, a registered massage therapist and Feldenkrais practitioner, runs Kavannah on a shoestring budget out of her living room. There is a core group of 60 people and a mailing list of 300.

"We created a new file folder of people who longed for an inclusive community and a sense of belonging as Jews," she says.

Kavannah puts out a newsletter informing members of events that could be of interest to the group. Duke also runs a telephone line with an updated listing of events.

"We try to provide like-hearted company for those searching for authentic ways to express their Judaism and spirituality."

Duke had heard of the Jewish renewal work of Rabbi Zalman Schacter-Shalomi while studying body awareness through movement techniques with Dr. Moshe Feldenkrais.

In 1987, she put an ad in The CJN inviting people to celebrate a holistic, spiritual fourth seder with her. Eighteen people showed up.

"We had a beautiful, magical seder together," Duke says. "We formed a Jewish explorations group, but it fizzled because there were no teachers to guide us."

The following year Duke was diagnosed with breast cancer. She says her healing incorporated traditional medicine, holistic methods and spirituality.

Shortly after she was stricken, she met Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi who was visiting Toronto. He made it possible for her to go to the international Aleph Kallah (retreat) for Jewish renewal in Philadelphia, she says.

That was the beginning of what she says was a spiritual odyssey that led her to visit many Jewish renewal communities in the United States.

In 1992, Duke was eager to share her experience with others in Toronto and Kavannah's first event was held that year at Baycrest Centre, where the group attended Rosh Hashanah services.

Duke now sits on the federation's action committee for Jewish continuity. She says she hopes Kavannah will be an inspiration to other individuals who want to create a forum to share their Jewish values.

Needing each other

The shadow cast by the murder of Yitzhak Rabin fell across the deliberations of the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Boston last week. Very few rays of light and optimism were able to pierce the inner disquiet felt by most delegates. However, the participation at the meetings of Avraham Burg, the youthful leader and chief executive of the Jewish Agency, was one of those rays.

He spoke relatively little about the far-reaching changes he is initiating at the Jewish Agency. Rather, sensing the need to calm the inner, soul-searching disquiet among delegates and perhaps even within himself, he spoke more about the pre-eminence and absolute irreplaceability of the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora.

Again and again he emphasized the interdependency of the two households, each helping to define the other, but more importantly each also desperately needing the other for the pieced-together integrity of the whole. He illustrated the point effectively with three rhetorical assertions: "There cannot be a Babylonian Talmud without Jerusalem as the reference point. There cannot be a Jewish physics without an Israeli gravity. There cannot be a Diaspora satellite without an Israeli centre point."

But if he was unhesitant and unequivocal to point out the importance of the relationship, he was however understandably tentative and vague in spelling out the details of relationship as we approach the new millennium, ever more distant from the first hand memories of the Holocaust, hopefully towards an era of Middle East peace, with oppressed Jewry nowhere to be found on earth.

He suggested that the relationship will need to evolve to one of mutual strengthening based on the constant reciprocal reinforcing of spiritual needs, of helping the other to foster, develop and maintain its Jewishness.

We agree with him. Inevitably, with the unfolding of modern industrial, economic, technological and political developments, the relationship will evolve away from one which responds only to the other's physical distress, to one which responds equally to the other's spiritual distress.

The educational goal

Last week in this space, we excerpted portions of the shiur following the killing of Yitzhak Rabin, of Rav Yehuda Amital, rosh yeshivah of Yeshivat Har Etzion, whom we described as "long a force for tolerance and moderation with the religious community in Israel."

This week we reproduce short excerpts from a shiur given on Nov. 13 by Rav Aharon Lichtenstein, also of Yeshivat Har Etzion, and also a force for the practical expression of the concept of ahavat Yisrael, the love of all Israel.

"We teach three things:

1. Even when sitting in the beit midrash, you have a responsibility to the community.

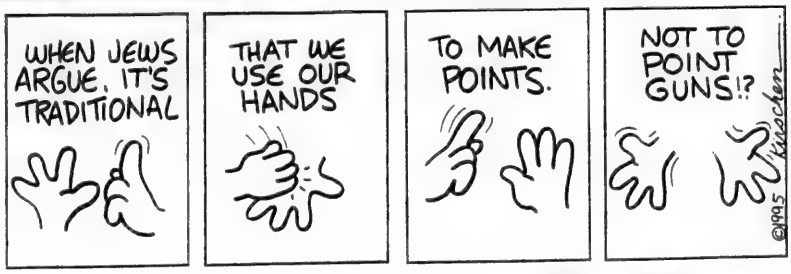
2. When addressing these problems, you have to think deeply and not simplistically.

3. Even when doing what is right, you have to know how to respect other opinions and the people who hold them.

"This has to be our educational goal. The question is not just what are the particular values we hold, but through which spectacles we view values, through which eyes.

Today we must, out of the crisis, assume an educational and ideological task ... The challenge is: Can we continue to inspire the yearning for sanctity, shake people out of complacency, get them to face the great call of the hour, to understand the importance of the medina, to understand the historical process in which we live, without losing a sense of morality, of proportion, of right, of spirituality?"

Rav Lichtenstein's words should be both our prayer and our prescription.



Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Nov. 24, 1919 a procession of thousands of Montreal Jews, organized by the newly founded Canadian Jewish Congress, marched to City Hall to protest the treatment of Jews in the Ukraine. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, C.J.C. 1995)

Appeal for dialogue and tolerance

Millions of women in the Jewish women's world organizations whose headquarters are in Israel are shocked and horrified by the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, of blessed memory, and deplore the manifestations of violence, delegitimization and lack of tolerance between one another.

In spite of the distinct ideological character of each individual movement, one must respect the other and search for common ground, in order to promote and strengthen shared Jewish values.

In this difficult time for each and every one of us, we must act with equanimity and forethought and express ourselves in a moderate manner in order to prevent, G-d forbid, the further deterioration of the situation to one of physical violence among brothers.

We appeal to the members of our movements in Israel and abroad to do their utmost to promote dialogue and tolerance, to educate towards unity, mutual respect and responsibility, to inculcate values of justice, goodwill and the love of all people which are embedded in the Jewish tradition and are the core of inseparable ties which bind Jews everywhere.

Re-united after 40 years

As a result of an advertisement placed in your paper, two cousins have been reunited after 40 years.

We were both born in London, England. In 1956, I immigrated to Toronto and she to Australia. We lost contact with each other and seven years ago she moved to Israel with her family. She became friendly four years ago with a woman who was visiting Israel from Vancouver and told her she had a cousin last known to be living in Toronto. This woman said she would try to locate me.

When visiting Toronto, she placed an ad in your paper. A friend of mine saw the ad and telephoned me. Now my cousin and I are reunited thanks to your publication. I shall be forever grateful.

Where have all the young people gone?

After attending a Holocaust Education Week lecture at Beth David Synagogue, I want to ask: Where did all the young men (and women) go? Maybe they were tired after a day with the children. Maybe they were tired after performing all the tasks around the house that had been put off until yesterday. Maybe they had heard it all before. Maybe they just didn't care. Maybe.

With so few exceptions that it was almost embarrassing, the audience comprised people who had survived this human tragedy that virtually defies words.

The speaker was eloquent, painting pictures that were hard not to visualise. As a mere lad of 15, he and his family were plucked from the relative safety of their homes and thrust into the abyss. Where were the people who needed to listen to this account? Where were those in the community aged from 15 to 50? Have they heard it all before? Is it too boring to hear again?

The voices from the past will not be with us for much longer. Soon the only voices left will be on celluloid. By the time you read this, Holocaust Education Week will be over for another year.

Applaud Parizeau's resignation

Premier Jacques Parizeau's disparaging remarks blaming ethnic groups for the narrow No victory in the Quebec referendum are both insulting and disgusting. It is shocking to think that the leader of a democratic province would have the nerve to put down his own people. Thank God the sore loser decided to step down as leader of his party.

Perspectives

A memory of Rabin

Some called him arrogant. Few realized that a man like Yitzhak Rabin could be painfully shy.

But as a friend, he was outstanding. He looked for ways to make people happy. A few years ago, he took my husband, a friend and me to lunch in the Members' dining room of the Knesset and then on a personal tour of the building.

"You know," he told us, "the Knesset faces the wrong way. And it's all my fault." With a rueful smile he explained. At the time that the Knesset building was conceived, Jerusalem was a divided city. When Rabin, then Commander-in-Chief of the army, was shown the plans, he was shocked to see that the front entrance faced No Man's Land, within gun shot range of the Jordanian snipers.

They would have been able to pick off any visiting dignitary at will. Rabin made a great scene and demanded that the plans be reversed. Instead of having a grand approach with a dazzling view, the Knesset would face the dull, flat vista we see now.

Before the construction was completed, the Six Day War had moved the nearest enemy soldiers beyond the Jordan River. Rabin waited with trepidation for the blast of criticism to come, but not a word was said. For 20 years, he told us, he had been waiting for someone to notice that the building was facing the wrong way and complain.

It has been said that Rabin sought personal glory, a place in history. In truth, he was driven by a love of his country.

Enshrined forever in history

All right thinking peoples throughout the world are shocked and saddened with the death of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. To Jews it is incomprehensible that a fellow Jew would harbor such hatred of the policies of a political leader and be driven to commit murder. It is not enough to say that Israelis like every other society on earth has its share of extremists and lunatics. Much more will have to be learned about Yigal Amir but it seems clear that he was encouraged and indoctrinated by ultra-nationalistic fervor which must be checked. No democratic society can survive if it permits an element which condones murder and abrogation of the rule of law.

Rabin has enshrined himself forever in Jewish history as a leader who epitomizes the spirit and moral fibre of the State of Israel. We can take comfort in the fact that he has initiated a peace process that is irreversible. Israel since its rebirth in 1948 has shown a remarkable resiliency and an ability to come up with one outstanding leader after another. Great challenges produce great leaders and while we mourn the loss of one of Judaism's greatest it is comforting to know that there are many who stand ready and willing to continue the march toward a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

Jean Charest's tribute

It was with profound shock and sorrow that I learned of the tragic and senseless murder of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin of Israel.

Yitzhak Rabin was much more than a pillar of strength in his own native country; he was a great world leader in the truest sense of the term. He loved peace and fought for it as only one who has tasted the bitterness of war can. His immense courage and inflexible determination to bring peace to his embattled homeland inspired countless people, not only throughout Canada, but around the globe as well.

Mr. Rabin died as he lived his life — a devoted and faithful servant of his country and his people. But the seedling which he planted has not died with him. It has taken root and will, with the care and nurturing of those who shared his vision, grow into a majestic tree whose fruit will serve as his personal legacy to future generations of both Israelis and Arabs, and an example to peace-loving people everywhere.

I join with Canadians from coast to coast in extending my deepest sympathy to Mr. Rabin's family, his fellow citizens and to the entire Jewish community of Canada. His untimely death is a grievous loss for us all.

Readers keep writing...

Not surprisingly, we continue to receive a great deal of correspondence on the subject of the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. As we wrote last week, the mail includes prose and poetry. In an effort to provide as comprehensive a vehicle as possible for our readers' expressions we have devoted our Perspectives page to more letters and two of the poems we received. Unfortunately, we will be unable to publish all the material.

On The Edge of Tears

Tonight I feel a sorrow that time cannot silence
My suffering is so personal and yet so linked to my people and state

The Jewish soul cries out in pain and anguish
As a nation is wounded from deep within
One unified voice mourns the loss of courage and virtue
As we struggle despondently to find comfort in a higher meaning
Today we laid to rest one of the great leaders this troubled world has ever known
We say goodbye to a man who devoted his life to freedom for his people and Peace for generations to come
The world has lost a true hero and
A nation has lost its way

Our history has been paved with sorrow and suffering but Never from within our own house
The mysteries of life have become masked in a cloak of darkness and despair

Somewhere in time man has lost his way
Tragedy has become accepted and values forgotten
People embrace hatred as their hollow god and Lose sight of the humanity in peace and happiness
We fight to find answers deep within ourselves as
The world takes one step closer to the edge
Future generations must realize what we could not
For fear that 'one day' will be too late

Most of all we must instil in the generations still to come
There is no cause more sacred than life and
No life that can be beneath morality
We must always move forward never forgetting what has brought us to this day and Never losing sight of where we are meant to be.

The Fallen Warrior

We wish that this was all a bad dream,
And that we would wake up and realize,
That a Jew really didn't murder another Jew;
That the strength of Israel was not gunned down;
That the voice for a gentler future was still among us,
To take us into a much safer world for tomorrow's children.

All of us are stricken with fear, with anger, with remorse.
We are all so poignantly reminded of the fragility,
Of the uncertainty that we must live with,
In order to continue to cherish the reality of a Jewish State.

We all ask why; why does this world have to bear such bitter fruit?
Why do we have to solve our disagreements with bullets rather than words?
Why do we have to wait until a great man falls to pay more attention?
When will our struggle end? What is it going to take for the pain to go away?
For the birth of peaceful coexistence not only between our Arab brothers,
Firat we must realize peaceful coexistence with our fellow Jew.

To the fallen warrior we wish you a grateful farewell.
For you have led the way with your strength of mind and character.
You have acted upon what most of us only dream about.
You have forgiven a terrorist, the enemy, and made him your partner,
All in the hopes of preparing the way for future generations to know
What harmony and understanding truly mean.

Shalom Aleichem, Lehitraot, until we meet again, Fallen Warrior,
In a world where there is no more pain, no more anger, no more war.
All we can hope for now is for the torch to be carried forth
By a people united by the light that you have illuminated.
May we follow your path with the same conviction, with the same consistency,
With the same honor and bravery that you have exhibited for all your glorious days.
We say: amen.

CAMPUS VOICE

Amazing interest in Judaism

A friend of mine asked if she could interview me for her comparative religion course. Her assignment was to compare Anglicanism with Judaism.

By Viva Press

As her only Jewish friend, I was the obvious choice.

Oy, I thought. She wants me to be the voice of a people whose religion is so diverse that they can't even agree amongst themselves on who is a Jew!

No way. I couldn't be the spokesperson for the whole people.

"But," I said, "I can tell you from my point of view what some of the beliefs and practices of Judaism are."

She readily agreed to listen. And she isn't the only one asking and listening.

I have found an amazing interest in Judaism among my non-Jewish friends. In order to familiarize themselves with our customs, some of them have even become non-affiliated members of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation. My two housemates, Leslie and Jenn, insisted that if I put a mezuzah on my bedroom door, I also had to put one on our front door. I did.

A popular topic that is often brought up in conversation is that of kashrut. The milk and meat part is easy to explain. So are the different parts of the animals and fish that make them prohibited, such as split hooves or fins. But the tricky part arises when somebody asks me how — let's say — sugar can be "unkosher."

I explain that when they see the special symbols that appear on almost every household product imaginable: COR, K, U, HK, MK ..., it means that that item is kosher. So sugar without one of these signs could mean that the machines used in the packaging process may have been used on the previous shift to package an unkosher item like lard.

"Hey Viva," one of my friends yelled from her end of the grocery aisle to my end. "Did you know that this dish detergent is kosher?" I came over to see. "You're right," I said. "And that's not all. It's kosher for Passover too."

It's fun to confuse my friends once in awhile. After all, I have been explaining this kashrut phenomenon for a year and a half now, and there seems to be no end in sight.

During my interview, I was quizzed among other things about Shabbat, chagim (Jewish holidays), intermarriage and the feeling of the Jews in the Diaspora for Israel. These questions were all personal and answered from my own perspective.

But I knew that sooner or later my interviewer would ask me about Jesus. I was worried that I would offend her. And then it came.

"Who do you think Jesus was?" she asked.

"A person who was born Jewish and died Jewish," I replied. And that was it. She understood that we had different beliefs and that there was no point in debating that fact.

But it was not the same scenario last year in residence at King's, when my roommate asked me the same question. She was from a small town in Labrador and I was the first Jewish person she had ever met. After she told me that I looked "normal" despite the fact that I was Jewish, she asked me if I believed in Jesus.

I explained that the fundamental difference between Jews and Christians was that Jews don't believe that Jesus was God or the son of God. She didn't get it. Everyone she had grown up with believed in Jesus, so why didn't I?

I didn't think people from small towns still believed that Jews look different. Twenty years ago a similar situation had occurred. When my parents moved from London, England, to Wilkie, a small town in Saskatchewan where I was born, my father was told by the locals that — contrary to their expectations — he looked quite normal.

But it's not only my non-Jewish friends who ask me questions about Judaism; my Jewish friends ask me too. Either their friends want to know about a custom about which they aren't certain, or they themselves want to know.

I'm not sure how I became a resource of Judaic information, but I have. Some of my friends tell me it's because I'm a student from Jewish day schools in Toronto and I visit Israel frequently; others say I am the only Jewish person they know; but to most I am the one who answered one question; so I must therefore be the one who is able to answer more.

My interviewer had one last question. Had I ever thought of what religion I would have chosen had I not been born into a Jewish family?

"No," I said.

It's a good thing I was born Jewish, because otherwise I would never have had the opportunity of seeing my housemate Jenn's expression when, this past Sukkot, I did the blessing on the lulav and etrog in our apartment. She watched in puzzlement while I waved a bunch of green sticks bound together and a really expensive lemon in the air!

A grandmother's care and love

My brother and the first snowfall of winter arrived together one November morning many years ago. Excited by these events I boisterously jumped about the bed I shared with my grandmother, who was minding my sister and me while my mother was confined in the hospital. With uncharacteristic gentleness she admonished me: "zie ruhig — be comforted, you don't understand this now but when you get older you will appreciate the importance of comfort."

By Jack Chisrin

My father's mother was the commanding presence in the family — a slight but vigorous woman, bound to Jewish tradition. She was always surly, a cynic, bitter about her fate in life, resentful about being married to a quiet, passive man who couldn't earn a living. She vented her rage by shelta — cursing. Her litany of curses poured out of her relentlessly. A continuous, non-repetitive stream, in rich idiomatic Yiddish.

Every misdeed was greeted with: A klole oyf em — a curse on him — followed by a damnation appropriate to the occasion. About her daily existence — Mayne sonim zoln azoy lebn — my enemies should live like this. Other curses that readily come to mind: Fun naches zol er platsn — From pleasure should he burst; Zol er vaksn ve a tsibele mit'n kop in drerd — May he grow like an onion with his head in the ground; Alle mayne tsuris zoln oyf zein kop oysgayn — All my troubles should be placed on his head.

Only her grandchildren were spared a direct curse. When any of us did something that aroused her anger, which happened frequently, her curse was prefaced with oyf dein tatns tata — on your father's father.

On this November day as I write a birthday greeting to my brother, I revisit the day of his birth and recall my Litvak bobba — (until I came to Toronto and married into a Polack family, I had the understanding that a bubbie was a prize awarded for coming last in a competition). I reflect on what she was trying to teach me about comfort. It is true that the older I get the more I seek to be comfortable. Yet I have come to realize that, for that particular feeling to exist, every tiny element must fit in its place. I'm sitting in an easy chair in my study, looking out the window at the garden which is now a palette of muted colors; the textures and sounds that surround me are tranquil and serene. However, if the neighbor's dog is barking, or a toilet is flushed, or a cloud darkens the sky, the unity of my peaceful state is jarred and comfort flies out the window. But what really prevents me from feeling truly comfortable, whatever my physical condition, is the sense of morality and the ethical training I received as a child.

Morality and ethics, this fantastic and complicated system of human behavior was taught to me by grandparents and parents. I learned to stand in awe and humility before the miracle of life, and that every person was as real as I was. I also learned that the world is in constant turmoil and conflict. So morality is not merely a way of life but a guide to action. And the principle for action is that I should respect all the people in the world equally. As I am not truly obedient to this solemn law, and as long as I am guided by my childhood training, I cannot be intrinsically comfortable.

For all her appearance, my grandmother was a remarkable woman who never was comfortable in her own life. Born into poverty in a shtetl in Belarus, married at an early age, faced with raising six children alone before she joined my grandfather in the goldene medina, comfort was not a blessing she could enjoy. She sustained and kept her family together by smuggling goods over the shifting borders of that part of Eastern Europe.

With her tyrannic will and determination, she coped with a debilitating illness and lived into her 70s. Her demeanor and curses could not conceal her true nature, for underneath she was kind, caring and loving. She maintained that a touch of goodness existed in everyone. In those around her, she encouraged it to grow, because if not nurtured it would die. Until the very end, she was still on a voyage of discovery and didn't believe in extricating herself from the human struggle with her ignominious excuse that it is already over. She couldn't have left a more lasting legacy.

Poverty fatigue

When this column reaches you, the referendum fever will have passed its peak and now we will have to cope with the after-effects of this latest illness.

By Rabbi. Gunther Plaut

Meanwhile there are other sicknesses to worry about. An invasion of Dengue and Ebola viruses has our medical establishment on the alert, and doctors are arguing about just how to define Chronic Fatigue Syndrome.

And now there is yet another malady to contend with: poverty fatigue. That of course has two sides. The poor are tired of their deprivations and the rest of society is tired of hearing about them. The former situation is primarily anchored in social conditions, while the latter is a state of mind.

I don't know how many of my readers are shul-goers, and even if they are, whether their rabbis have touched on this particular spiritual problem. So I will make use of this column to talk about a disease which is spreading rapidly.

The Torah has some fascinating things to say about poverty. To begin with, it believes that poverty will always be with us to some degree or other (Deuteronomy 15:11). But at the same time, it urges us to be aware of poverty's misery and urges us to be compassionate and forthcoming (Exodus 22:24-26). The original Jewish system of social welfare was the commandment to farmers not to cut the corners of the field when they were reaping and not to go back and pick up fallen produce. It was to be left for the poor so that they could satisfy their most immediate needs.

Unfortunately, Jews were all too often like many other people, and the well-to-do tended to disregard the existence of poverty. This in turn brought upon them the wrath of the prophets — most notably Amos, who in the eighth century BCE castigated Israel for "selling the poor for a pair of shoes," and predicted that the wrath of God would befall a people "who defraud the poor, who rob the needy." If they would not look to the alleviation of poverty, God's wrath would descend on them and punish them accordingly.

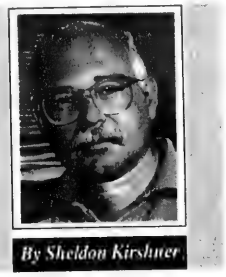
It is not surprising therefore that the concept of tzedakah became prevalent in Jewish tradition, and that looking to needs of the poor became a fundamental mitzvah. The word "welfare" may have a derogatory sound in the ears of some, but to the Jew it must always remind us of our obligations.

There are, to be sure, people who really don't want to work, but their numbers are few. There are indeed some who commit "welfare fraud," and they too are, according to the best statistics, a small minority. Governments in Canada and the United States have recently focused on those who have abused the system and in the process have succeeded in making the truly needy — of whom there are too many — taste the salt of their misery.

We Jews who were poor for so many centuries, nay millennia, should carefully guard our sense of compassion and translate it into tzedakah. Social reform is one thing, but when (hopefully unintentionally) it conveys a state of hard-heartedness, it becomes a public danger, for it will help to spread the virus of poverty fatigue which will not only injure those who need our help, but also cripple us who are the potential providers.

The Kirshner File

The inside story of the 1991 Gulf War



By Sheldon Kirshner

It seems like only yesterday that we were glued to our TV sets, raptly watching the Gulf War as it unfolded in real time on CNN. Many of us, caught up in the drama and dread of that widely televised conflict, wondered whether Israel would stick by its policy of restraint as Iraqi Scud missiles crashed thunderously into Israeli cities.

Israel, of course, did not strike back, although Yitzhak Shamir was the most hawkish prime minister in Israel's history. It was understood that Israel's self-control was dictated by the necessity of maintaining the cohesiveness and integrity of the anti-Iraqi coalition, which had been hastily stitched together by the United States after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990.

But what is clear now, following the publication of Moshe Arens' pungent memoirs, Broken Covenant (Simon & Schuster, $34), is that Israel really wanted to retaliate but could not because of American objections and obstructions.

Arens is in a position to know the inside story, having been minister of defence from 1990 to 1992. As he tells it, Israel intended to attack Iraqi missile sites in western Iraq, but called off the proposed land and air raid at the last possible moment.

Broken Covenant is more than an account of Israel's forced passivity in the Gulf War. It is an angry polemic of the Bush administration's alleged meddling in Israel's internal affairs in the late 1980s, as yet another peace process was launched with fanfare in the Middle East.

Arens levels serious charges against George Bush and his secretary of state, James Baker. He accuses the pair of interfering in Israeli politics in an undisguised attempt to bring down Shamir's Likud regime and replace it with a Labor party government more in tune with their vision of a Mideast peace accord.

Iraq's occupation of Kuwait touched off a crisis in Israel because the Iraqi leader, Saddam Hussein, was openly hostile to the Jewish state and could be expected to do something drastic. Given the fluid situation, Arens turned to Washington — hoping to establish "operational coordination" with, and to acquire real-time satellite photo intelligence data on Iraqi troop movements from, the United States. Bush rejected the requests, but Israel refrained from sending reconnaissance planes over Iraq.

To Arens' chagrin, Bush also withheld vital information on Iraqi test firings of ballistic missiles within its territory. Risking his career, William Brown — the U.S. ambassador to Israel — informed Arens of this dire development without first receiving official authorization.

Amid the crisis, the United States publicly demanded that Israel sever all military ties with South Africa. In Arens' opinion, the demand was designed to embarrass Israel. "It was a crude move, characteristic of much of the Bush administration's diplomacy toward Israel."

In January 1991, as war approached, Arens phoned Dick Cheney, the U.S. secretary of defence, and once again suggested operational coordination. Cheney, he informs us, stalled.

The unwillingness of the United States to countenance an active Israeli role in the war would be a persistent problem as far as Arens was concerned. After the first of 39 Scuds thumped into Israel, Arens ordered the Israeli Air Force to present him with a plan to neutralize Iraq's Scud launchers. Shamir, however, demurred, saying that he opposed any raid without coordination with the United States.

Arens claims that the United States failed to fulfil a promise to eliminate Iraqi Scuds. "...not a single mobile Scud launcher would be destroyed, despite statements to the contrary."

As the war wore on, Arens asked Cheney to arrange an "aerial corridor" so that Israeli aircraft could go into action against Iraq. Cheney referred the matter to Bush, while Arens, in consultation with his colleagues, continued to push for a forceful Israeli response. As a result of poor weather conditions, a decision was not taken. Shamir, he observes, seemed relieved.

With frustration in Israel steadily mounting, Arens unveiled another plan aimed at eliminating Scud launchers. Gen. Colin Powell, the U.S. chief of staff, found it "full of imagination and daring." But it, too, was still-born, snuffed out by an appeal for restraint from Bush.

"It was curious to see Shamir, so stubborn in confrontations with the United States, inclined to accommodate them now," he writes. "It seemed as if he had set aside certain issues on which he was not going to give an inch, and in compensation was prepared to concede the rest."

Arens claims that the Patriot missiles dispatched to Israel by the United States were not only ineffective but counter-productive. Instead of protecting the country from Scuds, the much-vaunted Patriots usually caused considerable secondary damage, as spent missiles landed in populated areas.

In a final attempt to convince the United States that Israeli restraint was of no practical value, Arens flew to Washington to meet Bush and his advisors. Arens made no headway. Bush was convinced that Israel could not make an appreciable difference to the conduct of the war.

Late in February, under pressure from Arens, Shamir approved a military operation against Iraq. "It was important for Israel to be an active participant, and not limit its involvement in the war to firing Patriot... missiles," Arens notes.

The raid, to which the United States objected, was set for Feb. 27. But it was cancelled by bad weather and a unilateral American ceasefire.

According to Arens, the Bush administration, and particularly Baker, undermined the Israeli government by leaking sensitive information and grossly misrepresenting the nature of high-level meetings between the two sides. "This was an outrageous contravention of all diplomatic practice," he fumes.

These confrontational tactics, which he claims were unprecedented in Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States, were designed "to discredit me personally." Arens overstates his case, ignoring previous acrimonious battles that temporarily soured Israel's relations with the United States.

Arens doesn't stop there. He accuses Shimon Peres (the finance minister in the second and last national unity government) of spending more time plotting against the government than attending to Israel's economy.

Furthermore, he charges that the Labor party engaged in "a web of surreptitious contacts" with the United States, Egypt and the PLO, in order to force Shamir to accept a peace plan he couldn't stomach.

Arens, who portrays himself as a Likud moderate, suggests that Shamir showed little enthusiasm for the peace process and that his Greater Israel views were divorced from reality.

What's more, he declares that three Likud ministers — Ariel Sharon, David Levy and Yitzhak Modai'i — "put the brakes on our peace initiative" and "created the impression that the Likud was not serious about advancing the process."

Arens, the foreign minister from 1988 to 1990, adds that the status quo in the territories became untenable after the intifadah. And he confesses that "there was nothing to be gained by continued Israeli control of the Gaza Strip."

Yet Arens' profession of realism is starkly limited. He criticizes Shamir for supporting "unrealistic doctrines" and chides fellow ministers for turning a blind eye to "the realities around us." But strangely enough, Arens adamantly refused to deal with the PLO, the sole umbrella organization capable of representing the diverse interests of the Palestinian people.

Later in Broken Covenant, Arens returns to this topic, unable to understand how Shamir envisioned a resolution of the Arab-Israeli dispute "without meaningful contact with the Palestinians." Arens, though, never identifies these Palestinians, and, in keeping with his rigidly ideological outlook, remains convinced that the PLO could not, and should not, be an integral part of the political landscape in the Middle East.

YITZHAK RABIN: ז"ל
An Evening To Honour His Memory
Tuesday, December 5, 8 p.m.
Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St.

This evening, marking the end of Sheloshim, will be devoted to reflections on Prime Minister Rabin's life and work for peace — as well as what his assassination means for Israel today.

We hope that all who support ARZA CANADA's commitment to a progressive Israel will join together for this evening of mourning and memory. In so doing, we will rededicate ourselves to achieving in our time that for which Yitzhak Rabin gave his life: Israel's security and enduring peace.

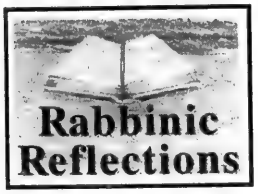
Praying for our unity



By RABBI YOSEF BENARROCH

The tragedy of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination has gripped the entire Jewish world. Our nation collectively mourns his loss. As I contemplate this abhorrent act, I cannot help but see the irony in it.

I remember vividly the events following the Yom Kippur War in 1973. At that time, I was living in Winnipeg and there was a massive showing of unity. Jews from all segments of the community came together in a rally, to support and show our solidarity with the State of Israel. The entire Jewish world was united. How ironical it is that during times of war we were so united and now in the pursuit of peace we are so divided.

I remember hearing a well-known saying: "If the Arabs would leave us alone," it was often said, "then we Jews would destroy ourselves." I always wished this statement to be false, but now my worst fear has come true. While I don't agree with the idea that we will destroy ourselves, I do agree with the fact that we have become our own enemies. That one of our own, a Jew, could assassinate the prime minister of Israel was unthinkable. That he could do it in the name of G-d and Torah is chilul HaShem, a desecration of G-d's name.

As a Jew who believes in the sanctity and guidance of the Torah, I have been forced to once again look into it and be guided by it. There is one story that comes to mind, in which one can draw numerous parallels. The story appears in the Book of Samuel, Chapter 24. The king of Israel at the time was Saul and he was in pursuit of David the future king. Saul's intent is clear — to have David executed. David must therefore flee the sword of Saul.

David and his men come to a cave and there they find refuge. Saul unknowingly comes to the same cave and in the cave he finds a place to lie down and sleep. Saul, David's enemy, is defenceless — he has no armor, he is not wearing his vest. It is David's chance.

Indeed David's men say to him, "Behold this is the day that G-d has spoken to you, saying I have delivered your enemy into your hands. Do to him as you please."

David, as the text states, also hears G-d's voice, but his reaction was very different. The future king approaches Saul, his enemy, his adversary, but he does not kill him. He tears a corner of Saul's garment with his sword. Later David tells us clearly and decisively why he spared Saul: "And he said unto his men, the Lord forbid me that I should do this thing unto my lord, the Lord's anointed one."

Our tradition is very clear. David could not raise a hand against a leader of Israel. To do so would be to defy the will of G-d; it would be a desecration of G-d's name.

Over the past few weeks, Jewish leaders in Israel and throughout the world have been talking about the need for unity. But the sad reality is we are a house divided. Talking about unity is not enough; it is time to act as well. As with any conflict, everyone involved must be willing to give a little. The situation in Israel is no different. Who will be the first to step forward and give a little?

I conclude with the words of Rav Kook who wrote that one who puts the unity of the Jewish people in jeopardy is similar to one who worships idols. It stands to reason that one who unifies the Jewish people in turn sanctifies the name of G-d. Let us pray that in these difficult times we will produce those who unify our people and not those who divide us.

Kollel starts its second year

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Or Chaim Kollel has begun its second year of operation.

Located at Or Chaim Yeshiva, 159 Almore Ave. in North York, it offers courses in advanced Torah study for men and women Monday to Thursday and on Shabbat.

On Mondays, there will be a shiur by Dr. Eric Lawee, a teaching fellow in Jewish history at the University of Toronto, on legal authority in Judaism, and one by Rabbi Shlomo Gemara, rosh yeshivah of Or Chaim/Ulpanot Orot, on the leading thinkers of the Mussar and chassidic movements.

Tuesdays will feature a shiur on Gemarah by Yitz Churtz and Dr. Shoshana Zolty will give a class in Chumash at Ulpanat Orot, 45 Canyon Ave.

Wednesday will again be chevruta learning followed by a short lecture by a guest speaker, and on Thursday, Rabbi Yitzchak Feigenbaum will speak on halachic and philosophical issues in the book of Devarim (Deuteronomy).

On Shabbat, one hour before Mincha, Dr. Reuven Gellman will discuss the weekly Torah portion.

A new feature of the Kollel is a women's beit midrash program, held Wednesdays from 1:30 to 3:15. Rabbi Jay Kelman will lead guided chevruta learning, starting with issues surrounding tzedakah.

The year started with a highly successful Elul Program, attended by over 500 men and women.

While there is no set fee, a donation of $50, $18 for students, is suggested.

For more information, or to register, call Rabbi Kelman, 416-630-6772.

Women's Institute shabbaton

TORONTO —The Women's Institute of Torah Study is holding its first shabbaton, from Friday evening, Dec. 1 until Havdalah on Saturday evening, Dec. 2.

Candlelighting, traditional Shabbat meals, lectures and comradeship will mark the event, the organizers told The CJN.

Topics to be discussed during the shabbaton include Sanity thru sanctity — the Sabbath Day by Dr. Lionel Gerber, a psychiatrist at Sunnybrook Hospital and a lecturer at the University of Toronto; insights into the weekly Torah portion, by Rabbi Yossef Gansburg of Lubavitch; and Woman of Valor — where can she be found today? by Chana Weisberg, dean of the Women's Institute of Torah Study.

The shabbaton will be held in the Bathurst-Steeles area.

Those wishing to participate are urged to register early, as accommodation is limited. For more information, or to register, call Goldie Plotkin, 905-881-2012, or Yentie Zaltsman, 905-886-3367 in the evenings.

Lecture on the Rabin murder and the religious community

TORONTO — Rabbi Nachman Bulman, dean of men at Ohr Somayach/Tanenbaum College in Jerusalem, will be speaking on The Rabin Assassination and the Religious Community in Israel, at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill on Nov. 30, at 8:30.

A media release from Ohr Somayach Thornhill says the topic was chosen "due to the strong emotions, confusion and sense of loss resulting from the murder of Yitzchak Rabin."

Rabbi Bulman lectures regularly in Toronto and Jewish communities throughout the world.

Admission is $5, and is open to the public.

For more information, call Ohr Somayach at 905-886-5730.

Jewish Life

A family torn apart

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Recent events in Israel have left us all shocked and struggling for some understanding of how we as a people have turned this treacherous corner. All of Israel agrees that the pursuit of peace is paramount, and yet we are so divided. The month of Kislev shows us that peace cannot be found externally if it does not exist internally.

This month's Torah portion tells of the family of Jacob, Leah and Rachel. The month concludes with holiday of Chanukah.

The Torah readings portray a family torn apart from the inside. Jacob loves only one wife, Rachel, but Leah is the fertile wife, the one bearing the children. The emotions involved are played out in the naming of the children. Each name carries with it a negative explanation. The oldest is named Reuben for "God saw my misery;" likewise the second son Shimon is so named because "God heard I was unloved." Most of the children's names bear the marks of their parents' struggles.

The family unit becomes the arena in which the parents pour out their bitterness and their resentment. The Torah does not ignore this issue but clearly tells the reader that these children grow up and attempt to destroy that very unit.

As young adults, the men kidnap their brother Joseph and debate murdering him. Joseph is ultimately sold into slavery. The brothers then report to their father Jacob that Joseph was slaughtered by a wild beast, thereby plunging their father into a lifetime of sorrow and grief.

In other words, the very real issues of the family were not dealt with openly and put to rest. Instead there were negative accusations constantly circulating just under the surface of appearance. Feelings built up, until finally a murder was plotted.

The end of Kislev brings us the holiday of lights — Chanukah. Historically, we know of the military victory and the restoration of the Temple. Maimonides states that women and men are equally obligated to the laws of Chanukah, for the women were part of the holiday. The war in which the Jews took part was fought by men, the Maccabees, but the women were equally involved. It is true they did not fight on the fields of battle; however, we have sources that tell of the women waging a similar war within the city limits. Jews were forbidden to practise even the most basic of Jewish rituals and it was the women who insisted on continuing their practice. The accounts tell of scores of women who gave up their lives in their insistance on remaining openly Jewish. The men waged the physical war while the women waged an equal war. It is unity of spirit and this balance within the nation that brought the miracles of Chanukah.

Jacob, Leah and Rachel teach us how doomed is a family unit when antagonisms are left unsolved while Chanukah shows us the unlimited heights achievable when harmony is found within.

An internship at TIKKUN

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

When I informed my parents that I was going to New York City for the summer to work as an intern at TIKKUN magazine, their foremost fear was that I was going to get mugged. My foremost fear was of getting indoctrinated by radical Jewish socialism. Based on TIKKUN's reputation as an outlet for fringe-group fanaticism, I expected a staff who would insist upon my conversion to '60s radicalism.

Guest Voices

TIKKUN is a journal of progressive left-wing politics founded in 1986 by editor Michael Lerner. Lerner, who holds a PhD in both philosophy and clinical psychology, created TIKKUN to provide an alternative to American conservatism and to instruct Jews and liberals on how to restore meaning in their lives.

Not a stranger to opposition, Lerner has been criticized for his involvement in the anti-war movement, his opposition to Likud policies on the West Bank, the self-congratulatory tone of his editorials and his dubious relationship with Hillary Clinton who borrowed his catchphrase "politics of meaning." Yet despite public scrutiny and media criticism, Lerner's controversial magazine TIKKUN remains dedicated to intellectual pursuits, regardless of the marginality of the topic.

Past contributors include Camille Paglia, Woody Allen and Allen Ginsberg and the magazine has featured articles entitled Sex and Yom Kippur, Jewish Slaveholders and Menstrual Revolution. For these brave literary endeavors, I decided to risk being mind-poisoned by those whose opinions I feared would be tainted by adolsescent idealism.

I arrived at TIKKUN to find a small and cluttered office on the fifth floor of a synagogue on Manhattan's Upper West Side. Displayed on the walls are comic strips ridiculing the Republican party's policies and caricatures of a befuddled Newt Gingrich.

But nowhere in the office were the counter-culture conformists I expected to find. Instead, to my surprise, TIKKUN's staff is comprised of intellectually sophisticated, politically astute and socially aware individuals with varying lifestyles and Judaic practices.

Sam, an intern at TIKKUN who is trying to break into journalism, gathers writing material by working at his uncle's kosher falafel and pizza joint in Queens. Paula, after returning home from Poland, is working towards a masters degree in Eastern European studies. She is reconciling her abandonment of the rituals of her chassidic upbringing with her love for the literature and oral traditions of her Jewish ancestors. Elliot is both a computer genius and a grassroots radical. With coffee running through his veins, his frenetic energy and strong convictions could convince Nancy Reagan of the virtues of radical social evolution.

But it is not only those working for TIKKUN who shattered my expectations by reflecting a spectrum of lifestyles and opinions. In a conference room packed with TIKKUN supporters, Lerner is holding a meeting for religious activists who are collectively creating a press release to state their opposition to the Christian Coalition. In attendance is a female rabbi wearing a kippah, a male Reform rabbi with his head uncovered, a lesbian reverend with a clerical collar, a dishevelled Lutheran reverend out of uniform and many others whose leftist convictions are being made clear.

Nearby, in TIKKUN's main office, a staff member has answered a telephone call from a transsexual Orthodox Jew. Another has opened a letter from a Conservative Jew in jail, whose self-proclaimed right to kosher meals is being denied. Interns are pouring over manuscripts submitted by writers and academic worldwide. The topics of these manuscripts range from far-fetched comparisons between child abuse and male circumcision to intriguing political analyses.

Certainly, critics have argued that TIKKUN gives credence to issues and fringe groups that do not belong within the serious arena of politics and Judaism. But this brand of intellectual snobbism only leads to a preservation of the status quo and ideological conformity. Change cannot occur unless one is willing to rethink one's methods, allegiances and points of view. This, however, requires exposure to issues and persons that might otherwise be neglected.

Throughout my internship, there were many occasions on which I disagreed with TIKKUN's criticisms of capitalism, Lerner's self-styled brand of Judaism and his strategies for healing social maladies. But my contentions were always listened to with an open-mindedness that is virtually absent in prestigious universities, the feminist movement and the Christian Right today.

I discovered that the TIKKUN staff and its supporters are committed to bringing about change, but not without intellectual flexibility. And it is this intellectual flexibility, the willingness to hear new ideas and to tolerate differences in lifestyle and opinion, that will lead to progress.

Quebec exodus said a victory for separatists

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If there is an exodus from Quebec and industries leave taking jobs with them, it will mean a victory for the separatists, Jim Peterson, Liberal MP for Willowdale, told a Town Hall forum at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) recently.

"We should not lose faith in Quebec," said Peterson, one of four Liberal MPs from Toronto who spoke to about 75 BJC members in the building's lobby. He said "moral suasion" is needed to convince all Canadians of the necessity of keeping Quebec in Canada.

"I hope there will not be a renewed exodus," said Barry Campbell, moderator and MP for St. Paul. "This is not the time to abandon Quebec."

An audience member said she was rebuffed in Montreal for speaking English, but agreed with Campbell that it is good that more school children are learning to speak French.

Loyalty to Canada

When a native-born Canadian in the audience objected that newcomers to Canada do not understand Canadian history, Joe Volpe, MP for Lawrence-Eglinton, said immigrants have to know Canadian history to obtain citizenship and members of ethnic minorities have demonstrated their loyalty to Canada.

Campbell encouraged people to travel to Quebec and invite Quebecers to visit here, suggesting that francophones outside of Quebec need support.

Sarcus Assadourian, MP for Don Valley North, congratulated the BJC for sponsoring the forum, stating, "It is a fantastic way to support Canada." He suggested there should be similar forums and gatherings in every mall in the city.

Michael Kerbel, BJC president, warned the panel of MPs that the national unity question must be resolved within one year.

"It's up to you gentlemen," he said. "You haven't got two or three years."

Kerbel said a greater understanding of Quebecers is apparent in Toronto. While a few years ago fans at a Blue Jays baseball game booed stanzas of O Canada in French, at a recent Raptors basketball game after the referendum, the same stanzas in French were cheered.

Super Sunday II

Two hundred volunteers on call

Talk about deja vu. Coming close to the turnout and enthusiasm for the UJA Campaign's first Super Sunday is always tough, but that's what Super Sunday II co-chairs Richard Sadowski and Carole Sterling managed to do.

About 200 telephone volunters raised $600,000 for 1996 alone on November 12 - Super Sunday II, making it the most successful of the 8 Countdown '96 telethons. The Countdown contribution total for three years approached $2 million.

Sadowski said he was most impressed with the cross-section of canvassers who volunteered and the number of "first timers."

"Our regular supporters are starting to have their kids come out and those people are starting to have their kids come out," he continued. "It's not unusual to see children as young as 10 sorting cards or distributing snacks to volunteers."

Sadowski and Sterling are recommending telethon volunteer recruitment in schools and among more community organizations next year.

Although Super Sunday II featured ongoing bingo games and prizes for phone canvassers, the volunteers, according to Sadowski, were motivated by more than the prospect of winning small gifts. "We had to force them on some people," he said.

So far, pledges for 1996 are running about 5% ahead of last year, with over $32 million committed for the following two years as well, in UJA's first Three Year Vision campaign.

Toronto's UJA became the only one in the world to seek three year pledges in order to ensure a stable financial foundation for the future and to free up canvasser time so non-contributors can be contacted.

For Sadowski, government budget cutbacks and increasing needs made it imperative for Countdown '96 to raise as much money as possible. "It was incumbent upon us," he said, "to do as well as we could."

Countdown '96 Co-Chair Richard Sadowski

Book documents Canadian fight for Soviet Jewry

Wendy Eisen was born and raised in Canada, but her heart has always been back in the former USSR, with Soviet Jewry. "If it hadn't been for my grandfather's instinct to leave Russia in 1904, it could have been me waiting to get out," explained Eisen, who has been at the forefront of the Canadian effort to free Soviet Jews since the early 1970s.

Wendy Eisen

In her new book Count Us In: The Struggle to Free Soviet Jews, A Canadian Perspective, Eisen, the 1995 UJA Campaign co-chair, draws from first hand experience to provide a detailed account of how Canadians from all walks of life, banded together to fight for the rights and freedom of Jews trapped under the Soviet Communist regime.

Her quest to raise awareness about the plight of Soviet Jews began after her first trip to the Soviet Union in 1978. "I sat with these people in their living rooms, saw their pain and felt their heartbeats," Eisen recalled. "That's when I knew I had to get every last one of them out."

Eisen felt that because the world had already stood by and watched millions of Jews die during the Holocaust, such apathy could only be tolerated once. "It was a second chance to save our people," she said.

Working together with other activists including Irwin Cotler, Alan Rose, Martin Penn, Edward and Edgar Bronfman, Father Barry Jones and William Attewell, Eisen organized demonstrations, lobbied governments and sent letters and packages to the USSR.

"Our goal was to get as much publicity as possible to secure the safety and freedom of Soviet Jews," recalled Eisen, who was refused a Soviet entry visa in 1984 but returned four years later after Joe Clark intervened on her behalf.

Her ultimate victory was realized in 1989 when the first Operation Exodus plane arrived in Israel. "It was then," she said, "that I finally got to see our efforts pay off."

Eisen believes that the Canadian Soviet Jewry movement was "a real unifying force for the Jewish community" and is proud that "Canada's support went far beyond any measure of our numbers. More people should know about this part of our history."

Yet, in spite of having achieved her goal, Eisen continues to be active in the community and for international Jewish causes. Proceeds from her book are being donated to UJA.

UJA'S Delta Force forges stronger ties

By Adi Waksman

All fundraising campaigns should possess a secret weapon as effective as UJA's Delta Force. At least that's the word from Delta Force chairman Dave Engel, otherwise known as "Delta Dave."

For the 1996 Campaign, Delta Force pioneered a new relationship between canvassers and contributors. According to Engel, it has made a big difference in the way canvassers canvass and donors donate.

"We needed to build a stronger relationship between canvasser and donor," explains Engel, who's been involved in UJA volunteer relations and canvasser training for twelve years. "The challenge was one of getting a strong commitment from the canvasser on the one hand and recognizing individual donors on the other."

Before the Campaign began, 8,000 letters were sent to contributors informing them of what to expect from their canvassers. The letters were customized and signed by canvassers in order to create a more personal contact. Donors also received brochures explaining the goals of the Three Year Vision so they would be prepared when the canvasser called. The final step in the Delta Force process was a personalized thank you note for everyone who made a pledge.

The letter writing campaign was so successful, says Engel, that "donors were calling canvassers.

"There's no doubt Delta Force contributed to both pledge increases and acceptance of the Three Year Vision."

"It boils down to this," notes Campaign Director, Ted Sokolsky, "no matter how good the campaign is...people give to people, and they give more freely when they feel comfortable with their canvassers."

By the way, if you're wondering about the name Delta Force, it was chosen because, as Engels puts it, "we didn't know what else to call it."

United Jewish Appeal gala attracts top donors

There's a gala going on down there. A view from above at the Barbara Frum Atrium in the Canadian Broadcasting Centre.

It may have been cold outside but the warmth inside was generated by more than hot soup on the menu.

Over 300 of UJA's best contributors attended the Major Gifts Gala, to accept a community thank-you before the 1996 UJA Campaign closes on December 6.

"It's great to see so many second generation people here," said Debbie Kimel, who chairs UJA's Major Gifts Division with Michael Daren and Charles Winograd.

The evening, co-chaired by Honey Sherman and Howard Sokolowski, was sponsored for the first time by The Royal Bank's Real Estate Banking Group.

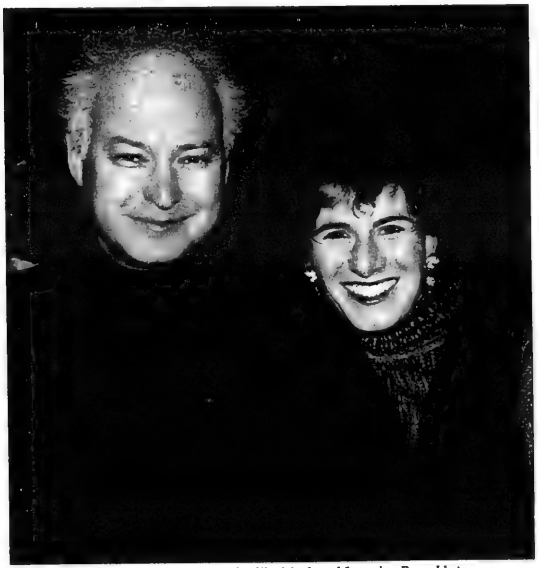
The event featured a tribute to Yitzhak Rabin, during which singer Rita Sue Fisher led a rendition of Shir L'Shalom (A Song For Peace), sung by Prime Minister Rabin moments before he was slain on November 4.

During his remarks, Israeli Consul General Yehudi Kinar, reminded the audience of Rabin's recent plea for Diaspora Jewish communities to continue working to raise money for Israel. "You have helped make his wish come true," said Kinar.

Other highlights included remarks from Yossi Goldberg, the mayor of Metulla, Rabbi Gunther Plaut who called UJA "the glue that binds Toronto's Jewish community with Israel," and 1996 Campaign co-chair Carol Kassel who thanked Major Gifts Division members for "accepting their responsibilities as leaders of the community."

Major Gifts Division co-chair Charles Winograd makes a point during his address to 300 gala goers.

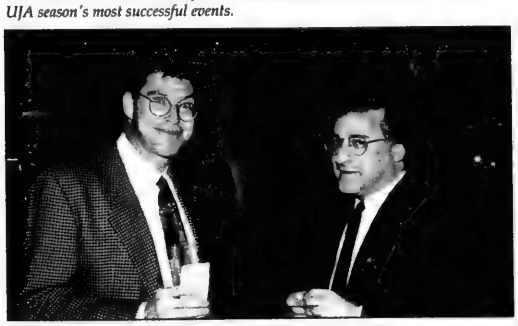
Major Gifts galas are obviously for families. Golda Krakowsky is flanked by husband Harry (L) and brother David Brown.



The gala gathered many happy couples like Mark and Lorraine Berenblut.

Howard Sokolowski and Honey Sherman deserve to smile after chairing one of the UJA season's most successful events.

A pause for thought. Rabbi Gunther Plaut reflects before his remarks.



Oops! Who said anything about a camera? Photographer Stephen Epstein found Warren Kimel (L) and Randy Shiff sharing a conversation in a corner of the atrium.

The Israel Connection. Operation Exodus architect Dr. Baruch Gur (L) and his wife Miri with Tootsie Halbert and her husband Gerry, president of United Israel Appeal, Canada.

Singing a song for peace. Rita Sue Fisher leads gala guests in the melody sung at the rally which Yitzhak Rabin attended before he died.

Special Report

Hooking on to hate

By Adi Waksman and Howard English

Hate literature is littering the information highway and there is little that can be done to patrol it.

An estimated 40-55% of Canadian households can now access the Internet where web sites disseminating hate can potentially reach more than 30 million users world-wide. Although Holocaust denial and white supremacist material are easily available, there have been no Internet-related prosecutions in Canada so far.

Bernie Farber, National Director of Community Relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, a Federation sponsored agency, thinks hate on the Internet is "a significant problem."

"With today's technology, any individual or group can post messages to be seen by 30 million people at a very low cost," explains Farber, who has been monitoring web sites for the last 6 months. "It's the newest, most advanced and potentially the greatest form of communication available to hatemongers. It's still a relatively small part of Internet activity but it garners so much attention because of its audacity."

One organization called Stormfront promotes itself on the net as a "resource for those courageous men and women fighting to preserve their White Western culture."

Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel recently used his web site to issue a press release labelling slain Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin a "repentent Jewish murderer." Zundel also posts a brochure called 66 Questions and Answers on the Holocaust, originally issued by the Institute for Historical Review, a California based Holocaust denial organization. The publication disclaims any evidence that six million Jews were killed in the Holocaust and asserts that "after the war, millions of Jews were still alive in Europe. Hundreds of thousands (perhaps as many as one and a half million) had died of all causes during the war. Others had emigrated to Palestine, the United States and other countries."

Farber, who has been conducting workshops for Holocaust Education Week, estimates there are 4 or 5 individuals in Toronto who engage in hatemongering on the Internet but maintains the problem is international and hard to control. "In those cases where the material borders on illegal, laws can be applied, but the difficulty lies in locating the direct source," says Farber.

In Canada, Criminal Code provisions against inciting hatred apply to the Internet and the Canadian Human Rights Act forbids the promotion of hatred or contempt by telephone line.

However, many Internet users oppose content regulations because they feel information highways should be the last bastion of free speech.

Farber disagrees. "Hatemongering is not free speech," he insists, but he does not think that new laws are warranted or possible. Instead, he says,"we have to look at more imaginative ways of making society more responsible." Encouraging users to adopt a voluntary code of ethics is one of the options he favours. Educating users is another. "It's all about understanding who the good guys and bad guys are."

The Canadian Jewish Congress has already set up a committee to monitor the Internet for Canadian hate and is expected to develop specific recommendations on how to deal with the problem by the end of this year.

UJA's front page mission

It's a story for the times. That is, the Jordan Times.

Regent outlines Jordan's vision and approach to regional development

By P.V. Vivekanand
Jordan Times Staff Reporter

AMMAN — The concept of economic development of the Middle East and taking advantage of the business opportunities in the region is all on of peace appears to be the underlying theme of the conference, His Royal Highness Crown Prince Hussein said Tuesday.

The Crown Prince cited the expected attendance of government leaders and businessmen from 63 countries at next week's Middle East and North Africa (MENA) summit as one of the strongest signs of the acceptance, adding that Jordan was making sure bilateral moves towards realising the

Hineni members were hosted by Jordan's Crown Prince Hassan, King Hussein's son, at the royal palace - an event that would probably not have been possible before Israel and Jordan signed a peace treaty this year.

A Jordan Times reporter, P.V. Vivekanand, wrote about the Crown Prince's encounter with the Canadian contributors. "Earlier in the day, the Crown Prince met with a Canadian Jewish Appeal delegation and said there was a lot to be done in the peace era and after the signing of the Jordan-Israel peace treaty for building sustainable peace in the region," said the article.

United Israel Appeal Missions Director, Victor Yagoda, described the Crown Prince as a "real mench."

"We were all excited to have an audience with him, especially on short notice," said Dr. Gerry Halbert, President of United Israel Appeal of Canada. "He introduced himself and shook hands with everyone."

Halbert, who was at the Israel-Jordan peace agreement signing ceremony, expressed pleasure at how much progress has been made in relations between the two countries.

The Hineni participants also visited sites supported by their donations; among them, the Canada Centre recreation complex in Metulla, Israel's northernmost city. There, they participated in the dedication of Israel's only Olympic-sized skating rink, built through a gift given to UIA by Bill and Dorothy Drevnig. Canada Centre attracts about 500,000 visitors a year.

Also on the itinerary were trips to Or Yehuda, Beit Dagan and Kfar Gvirol - communities in which Canadian donors have invested through the Project Renewal program - and the Collier Community Centre in Eilat, a UJA-financed facility.

"It seemed like the whole neighbourhood was there," recalled Dr. Allan Reitzes, Executive Vice President of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. "It was a real celebration."

Young leaders doing the right thing

Government budget cuts, immmigration and social policy, were just some of the hot topics recently covered at UJA's annual Young Leadership Network retreat. More than 40 people participated in the one day program hosted by Marlene and Robert Axmith.

Do the Right Thing, the theme of this year's retreat, was about "finding out what our responsibilities are to the Jewish community and to the general community," according to Jeff Kirsh, who co-chaired the event with Hannah Springer. "It was a day for those already significantly involved with the Campaign to gain a more in-depth understanding of the issues affecting the community."

First on the agenda was a briefing from Jewish Family and Child Service, followed by break-out sessions with social workers leading group discussions about specific cases. "It gave us a look at a side of the community most of us don't get the opportunity to see", says Kirsh.

Steven Shulman, Associate National Director of Community Relations at Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, offered an overview of CJC's political agenda. Rabbi Mark Dratch was on hand to discuss what Jewish law and tradition have to say about welfare and social responsibility, and Leo Levi recounted the warm welcome he received from Jewish Immigrant Aid Service, a Federation supported agency, after arriving in Toronto from war-torn Sarajevo. He thanked the community for helping him find a job and an apartment.

YLN retreat co-chairs Hannah Springer and Jeff Kirsh.

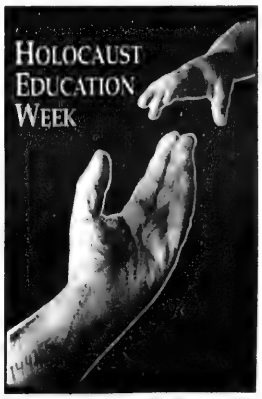
Nazi doctors paved the way



By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The German medical establishment paved the way for the Final Solution, according to a leading expert on medical practices and theories during the Nazi era.

Dr. William Seidelman, medical director of Wellesley Hospital's HIV ambulatory program, recently told some 200 people at Pride of Israel Congregation during Holocaust Education Week that the idea "of mass destruction arose in medicine" — doctors made it possible and acceptable.

Seidelman spoke of the widespread Nazi-era practice of eugenics: forced sterilization and euthanasia in order to put into practice the racial purification/hygiene theories espoused by the German medical establishment.

He gave a chilling account of the euthanasia program carried out from 1940-41 authorizing the medical murders of 70,000 mentally disabled people living in institutions.

Euthanasia experts travelled to mental institutions "to find patients for the program" who were then transported to "killing centres" at one of six psychiatric hospitals, the basements of which were specially equipped with gas chambers that looked like showers, and crematoria for burning remains, Seidelman said. "Turning on the gas was a designated medical act."

A "pilot project" for a feasibility study on the Final Solution, using Jews and Polish resistance fighters, was launched at these killing centres, which became the prototype for the large-scale gas chambers and crematoria used at the Nazi death camps, he said.

According to Seidelman, German physicians were overrepresented in the Nazi party, with 46 per cent of them members. "Nazi medicine was mainstream."

Joseph Mengele, the notorious medical director at Auschwitz, "could not have done what he did without being part of the establishment."

The German medical establishment's views on racial hygiene and eugenics were well-documented in scientific journals and were read by the international scientific community, Seidelman said.

In fact, he began his investigation of German medical history 15 years ago after reading one of these articles in an American medical journal from the '30s and discovering that the world's scientists neither commented nor censured German racial theories.

Following the paper trail has been an arduous task for Seidelman because most Nazi physicians (few were prosecuted after the war) became part of the post-war medical establishment, which has used its power to suppress information about the Nazi period, he said.

He pointed out that every research institute, medical institution and psychiatric hospital that participated in the killings and exploitation are still in existence. Furthermore, there has never been a nation-wide effort to rid the research and teaching institutions of the medical specimens gathered during the Third Reich, Seidelman said.

"The skeletons of Polish resistance fighters are probably still being used [as teaching tools] today."

Lawyer finds Nazi war criminals unremorseful

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No expression of remorse by those accused of Nazi war crimes was ever heard by one U.S. lawyer assigned to prosecute them.

"I was involved with a dozen or more of them and I never heard an expression of regret from anyone," Robert G. Seasonwein of Washington, D.C. told a Holocaust Education Week meeting at Beth Sholom Synagogue. He replaced Alan Held of Minneapolis, who could not attend because of family illness.

The Office of Special Investigations (OSS) in the U.S. Department of Justice, to which Seasonwein is attached, prosecuted 100 cases of those accused of Nazi war crimes, and only three of those charged admitted atrocities, he said.

Typical of their attitude, he said, was a man who drove a truck from Vilnius to Belarus, where he picked up people and drove them to a gravel pit.

"He told me, if you can believe it, that he never looked at the people in the truck and didn't know what happened at the gravel pit," Seasonwein said.

"When we talked with them, they came across as ordinary people and gave no hint that they could have taken part in atrocities. I have no explanation of why they did it."

Seasonwein acknowledged there is "not a lot of interest in European countries in pursuing [Nazi war criminals] any more. People want to let this die off," he said.

"I'm not entirely sure if it [the Holocaust] couldn't happen again. It's important for people to be aware of the potential evil in anyone, just below the surface."

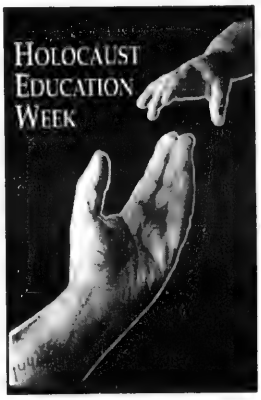
'A jigsaw with a million pieces'



Holocaust Museum compiling list of names

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., has begun work on a central index of names using an astonishing and diverse range of Holocaust sources, including the so-called Auschwitz Death Books, copies of which the museum acquired only three months ago.

"We have about 500,000 names on the database at the moment," said Peter Lande, the retired career diplomat who is a leading consultant to the project. "It's small, but it's growing."

Speaking at a meeting of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada during Holocaust Education Week, Lande gave a sense of the enormity of the project as he described some of the sources being used.

During the Shoah, the Germans confiscated Jewish records of all kinds from all over Europe and shipped them to Berlin. When the Russians overtook Berlin in 1945, they seized these records and stashed them into archives in Moscow. In recent years, personnel from the U.S. Holocaust Museum have been permitted to microfilm some of them, Lande said.

Similarly, museum personnel have attained copies of many Nazi-kept lists of deportations, transports and concentration camp inmates, as well as a surprising amount of Holocaust-era Polish-Jewish records located in French archives.

In 1944, all Jews in Nazi-occupied Hungary were required to provide detailed family trees to the authorities, and the museum expects to include these in the master index as well.

The Auschwitz Death Books, which the Russians confiscated from the Nazis and kept hidden in Moscow until 1990, provide many details about inmates. Similar books from Bergen-Belsen have also recently come to light.

A list of 250,000 Jews from Lodz, a list of Jews in France prior to the Nazi invasion, even Schindler's celebrated list of saved Jews will eventually be integrated into the central index, according to Lande, who said that more than two million names are waiting to be input.

"It's never going to be nice and neat," he said. "It's going to be a cut-and-paste index. Think of a jigsaw puzzle with millions of pieces and no pattern. That's what we're working on."

The museum's central index will certainly be a boon to Holocaust researchers and genealogists, but Lande expressed indifference to the revisionist preoccupation with the number of Jews killed. "The death of six million people is a statistic, the death of one person is a tragedy," he said. "That's my approach."

'The past is never dead'

To further elucidate his philosophy, Lande quoted the American writer William Faulkner: "The past is never dead; in fact, the past is never passed."

Lande appealed for 10 volunteers in the Toronto area to enter names into a computer, and another 10 to act as proofreaders. "Our problem is not a lack of information," he said. "We have lots of information, and we're getting more every day ... What we need is people to enter the data and to proofread the data."

Lande's encyclopedic knowledge of the Holocaust became especially apparent in the question-and-answer session that followed his talk, when many people asked about many respective localities and concentration camps. "Treblinka? Forget it," he said in answer to one questioner. "There was no work detail at Treblinka — off the train, and that was it. All we have are transport lists."

To another, he explained that contrary to popular belief, being shipped to Auschwitz was not necessarily a death sentence.

"If you were under 15, you went into the wrong line immediately, and the same if you were over 45," he said. "If a person was between those ages, there was a fair chance that he was put into a work detail and shipped somewhere else."

Comparing the Holocaust Museum's envisioned index with the three million names already on record at the Yad Vashem museum in Israel, Lande explained that Yad Vashem's records were based entirely on personal memory, whereas the Holocaust Museum's records would come entirely from documentary sources.

Bar Mitzvah boy 'twins' with Holocaust victim

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Larry and Arna Banack's quest to bring meaning to their son's Nov. 11 bar mitzvah celebration at Beth Sholom Synagogue has succeeded beyond their expectations.

On a personal level, the Toronto couple and their three children — Adam, 13; Hailey, 10; and Mara, 8 — have been enriched by their association with Holocaust survivor Max Eisen, 66. For his bar mitzvah, Adam chose to "twin" with Eisen's brother Shmuel, who died in Auschwitz at age 12.

The idea was based on a concept popular in the 1970s, when many bar and bat mitzvah celebrants twinned with refuseniks from the former Soviet Union, said Larry.

On a community level, the Banacks' idea has spawned a formalized bar/bat mitzvah twinning program at the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto. Coincidentally, Adam's bar mitzvah turned out to be in the middle of Holocaust Education Week.

"We thought it was really important that a bar mitzvah be more than just a party," Arna told The CJN. "We wanted to do something that underlined the importance of continuity."

Holocaust survivor Max Eisen shows Adam Banack, 13, the plaque commemorating his family at the Holocaust Memorial and Education Centre. [Frances Kraft photo]

With that in mind, the Banack family began by visiting the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, after which the idea of twinning began to take shape.

Adam, a student at Forest Hill Public School, also volunteered at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and participated in a pre-bar mitzvah program to help make the preparation year more meaningful. This summer, the family visited Israel, where Adam read from the Torah at Masada.

But probably the most challenging aspect was translating into reality the Banacks' idea of twinning with a Holocaust victim.

"We wanted to know something about the child who had died. We didn't want just a name," said Arna.

Adam's relatives had immigrated before the Holocaust, so Larry and Arna turned to friends to help locate a survivor willing to share memories of a child who had perished.

It appeared their search would be in vain. One person told them flatly, "Forget this. No survivor would want to talk about it."

Finally, they contacted Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Memorial & Education Centre, who put them in touch with Eisen.

For him, the experience was healing, he said after the bar mitzvah, which he and his family attended as honored guests. "It was like the circle has come around."

Adam, who spoke at his bar mitzvah of "continuing the tradition that skipped Shmuel's generation," felt comfortable with Eisen almost immediately, he said. They met several times, along with the rest of the Banack family. Each conversation lasted hours.

Eisen recalls his brother Shmuel as a clever boy who excelled at school and cheder. Until war broke out in 1939, their family — three brothers, their parents, paternal grandparents and an aunt and uncle — lived an idyllic life in a large house in Czechoslovakia. Their town became part of Hungary following the breakup of Czechoslovakia in 1939.

Max's father owned a small distillery; his grandfather and uncle, a lumberyard.

In the summer of 1943, his mother gave birth to a girl. Nine months later the family was shipped to Auschwitz. Max, who had celebrated his own bar mitzvah in 1942, was the only one to survive.

Following the war he spent three years boarding at a yeshivah near Prague, apprenticing as a dental technician while continuing his Jewish education. He immigrated to Canada in 1949.

In Toronto, he began to rebuild his life. His English improved dramatically with much reading and frequent trips to the movies.

Eisen's first job in Toronto was at Art Bookbinding. The Canadian-born woman who hired him — Rose Cosman, a part-owner of the company — invited him for dinner and welcomed him into her home as family. In 1952, they became family when Eisen married Cosman's daughter Ivy.

"I think it's a very good idea," said Max of the twinning project. "This is a way of guarding that something like [the Holocaust] never happens again."

B.C. Roundup

Stories by Maurice Lucow

Torah Dedicated

WHITE ROCK, B.C. — More than 200 members of the White Rock/Surrey Jewish Community Centre recently welcomed and dedicated their new Torah, presented to them by Morris and Deena Wosk and family of Vancouver.

White Rock and the neighboring community of Surrey are about 50 kilometres south of Vancouver, near the U.S. border.

The centre, located temporarily in the White Rock Centennial Park Pavilion, was organized by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) about a year ago.

Present at the ceremony were White Rock Mayor Bob Bose; Councilman David Webb; members of the area's clergy; Drew Saffenberg, executive director of the JFGV; Itzchak Fuchs, Jewish National Fund shaliach; and Norman Franks, Israel Bonds director for Western Canada.

The dedication ceremony began with a procession through the community led by Hebrew school teachers Jeff and Jean Solomon and 50 children singing and waving Israeli flags. The Torah was handed to Ken Wosk, who carried it through the crowd to the centre, which also serves as the shul. Wosk turned it over to the community president Ted Gerstl, who accepted the Torah "with profound humility and appreciation."

Gerstl, speaking to the children, said, "Everything that is essential and important for you to know is in the Torah, a Torah that is here for you, residing forever in White Rock, and to learn from."

Impressed with the size and enthusiasm of the White Rock/Surrey Centre membership, Wosk urged Gerstl: "When you're on a roll, go for it," and he pledged $25,000 for the construction of a building for the community, if Bose and his council could provide the land.

Children and the Holocaust

VANCOUVER — More than 2,000 Lower Mainland pupils and teachers from Grade 5 and up are expected to see the exhibit We Were Children Then by the time it closes in mid-December.

The exhibit at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre comprises photos, letters and a few possessions saved by 17 Vancouver Jews who were hidden or in camps as children during the Holocaust.

"These few photographs are the only tangible images that we have of our carefree childhoods," states a large poster at the entrance to the exhibit. "We did not know then, nor could we ever have imagined, just what was in store for us, just because we were Jewish."

The exhibit is powerful in its simplicity, showing happy-go-lucky youngsters at play or generally enjoying life with their families, plus artifacts the kids managed to conceal from their Nazi captors.

A teaching guide sent to teachers in advance of class tours points out that from 1933 to 1939, German Jewish children were barred from schools and other public places by the race-segregation Nuremberg Laws. Frantic parents managed to get thousands of the children on "Kindertransports" to Britain. Some were hidden by non-Jewish families and others were deported to concentration camps, where 1.5 million of them perished.

The guide also contains replicas of letters and postcards shown in the exhibit.

The 17 survivors all take turns appearing in person during the schoolchildren's visits to respond to questions and make the events of 50 years ago more relevant to the present.

The teaching manual says the fate of the children during the Holocaust shocked the world and served as a catalyst for the United Nations Declaration of the Rights of the Child on Nov. 20, 1959. That day is designated as National Child Day in Canada.

Dr. Serge Vanry, president of the Holocaust Society's Child Survivor group, says that when he came to Canada in 1947, he had been advised by local people not to think or talk about his experience.

"But we have to talk about it," he said. "We keep hearing the Holocaust deniers saying it didn't happen.

"If we are not going to be witnesses and speak up, then what will happen to the next generation? Statistics and numbers are meaningless. A personal experience has great impact."

The exhibit was curated by Viviane Gosselin and the teachers' guide was designed by Frieda Miller, education coordinator of the Holocaust Education Centre. The guide has an extensive list of books and songs, as well as a glossary of terminology used in discussing the Nazis and the Holocaust.

Recalling Kristallnacht

VICTORIA — German-born Hubert Beyer still remembers what he saw as a child on Kristallnacht in his hometown of Dusseldorf.

He recalled that terrible night at the annual Kristallnacht commemoration, held here recently at Congregation Emanu-El.

Beyer, a syndicated columnist who resides in Victoria, said the morning after the Nazis went on their rampage in November, 1938, he and his mother, who was taking him to nursery school, "stepped out the door of our apartment building and were confronted with indescribable scenes."

He said the street was littered, knee-deep and higher in places, with household belongings.

"There were mountains of clothes, kitchen utensils, furniture, books, radios. Overnight, storm troopers had invaded the homes of Jews and thrown their entire belongings onto the streets. On the way to school, I saw storm troopers throw a grand piano out of what must have been a fourth- or fifth-storey window. The opening had been enlarged, probably with a sledge hammer."

Beyer, who is not Jewish, said history calls Kristallnacht the beginning of the systematic destruction of a people.

Beyer thanked the shul for inviting him "to this very important evening. That you would have me, a German-born Canadian, attend such a sad but essential ceremony, bears testimony to man's boundless capacity to forgive. It makes me joyous and humble at the same time." He emphasized, though, that he said forgive, not forget.

The service was conducted by Rabbi Victor Reinstein, who chanted the K'el Maleh Rachamim. He welcomed Syrt Walters, a Righteous Gentile who lives in Victoria. Walters presented the rabbi with a copy of his book on his experiences in hiding a Jewish family in his home in Holland during the war.

Primo Levi Parley

VANCOUVER — A two-day international conference on Primo Levi, a secular Italian Jew and Holocaust survivor who committed suicide in 1987, was held here recently.

Levi's work as a writer and Holocaust educator was discussed by academics from the United States and Canada at the event sponsored by the University of British Columbia's continuing studies department and the local Holocaust Education Centre.

In addition, Zachor, the publication of the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society, featured Levi in its October issue.

Levi, born in Turin, joined a unit of Partisans in 1943 but was arrested soon after by the Italian fascist militia. A declared atheist, he said he was an "Italian citizen of Jewish blood," and was deported to Auschwitz in February 1944, where he was a prisoner until liberation a year later.

Because he was a chemist, Levi was forced by the Nazis to work for I. G. Farben Industries, a chemical manufacturer.

On his return to Turin in 1945, he wrote a book about his experience in Auschwitz, in which he said, "I tried to look objectively at the death camps — at the oppressors and the victims."

The book was rejected by Italian censors but was published in 1947 by a small press, and although it was ignored for years, by 1966, it was a European bestseller.

In 1947, Levi retired as manager of a chemical company and took up writing as a full-time career, until his death in 1987. At that time, his work was availabe in English and attracted considerable readership in North America.

By the end of his life, Levi was convinced the Holocaust was destined to become a routine historical atrocity. He was troubled, said Prof. Nicholas Patricca of Loyola University in Chicago, by the "sentimental distortions of survivors and sympathetic historians, and by the amnesia of those responsible for the exterminations."

Arthur Samuelson, who was Levi's American editor and publisher, says of Levi's book, Survival in Auschwitz: "He helped me recognize both the victims and the perpetrators and to understand just how human dehumanization can be."

Rabbi Wine Speaks

VICTORIA — Since 50 per cent of American Jews are not affiliated with their communities, the secular Humanistic Judaism movement is reaching out to a constituency that's not being served by other streams of Judaism, says Rabbi Sherwin Wine, founder of the international Society For Humanistic Judaism.

"We are not competitive," he says. "We provide a service to those who want to be Jewish but feel they cannot identify with the traditional ceremonials of Orthodox, Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist congregations. We are a fifth alternative in Jewish life.

"Our principle is not to say things we don't believe. We don't wear tallisim or kippahs or things that suggest a different lifestyle," the rabbi told The CJN in an interview.

Rabbi Wine was in Victoria recently to address the Victoria Society For Humanistic Judaism, the only branch of the movement in Canada. There are about 50 branches in North America and in eight countries, with a total international membership of close to 35,000.

Rabbi Wine organized the first Humanistic synagogue — which he still serves — in Farmington Hills, near Detroit, 26 years ago.

"It's difficult to find the presence of a loving and just providence in the past 2,000 years of Jewish history," he said, "especially in this century of the Holocaust."

In the end, "we as Jews are masters of our own fate, solving our problems within ourselves. In terms of a non-theistic vocabulary and ideology, God is not a central force."

He pointed to the founders of Zionism and modern Israel as secular Jews, and to David Ben-Gurion, who said they couldn't wait for the Messiah. They founded the State of Israel with their own power, and kibbutzim were the first to practise Humanistic Judaism, he said.

The Humanistic movement reveres the 3,000-year-old history of the Jews but, said the rabbi, the world has changed and "we can't go back. We can't agree with the fundamentalists' views that only what they know is right. Judaism doesn't want to go back, and we must prepare to go forward into the 21st century."

In his own congregation, there are no services, no davening. Rather, a service is a "celebration," and davening, led by a trained leader, is "study time" on Saturday morning, including a short reading from the Torah or Talmud and other significant books, poetry, songs and discussion. There is "lots of audience participation."

"We respect the Torah as a most prestigious book, as the first document of Judaism, but not the fundamental document. Our children are required to know it. We start Shabbat with a reading from the Torah."

All Jewish holidays and Shabbat are celebrated, as are Jewish life cycles. After proper training, leaders are authorized by the synagogue, and legally, to perform marriages.

The movement is training rabbis at headquarters in Detroit, where the first rabbi will be ordained in two years. Rabbis must have a doctorate from a secular university and then study at the Humanistic seminary for five years, Rabbi Wine said.

JNF Plans

VANCOUVER — The Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF) plans to raise $3 million as its share of the cost of building a park and amphitheatre as a gift to the Jerusalem 3000 festivities.

The project is international in scope, but Canada will likely be providing the largest share of the required amount, says Naomi Frankenburg of Vancouver, national chair for the Canadian campaign. Committees are being set up in major Canadian centres.

Frankenburg said the Canadian campaign expects to raise the $3 million through 1,000 contributors, who will give a minimum of $3,000 each.

"I'm optimistic we'll have no problem reaching our goal. We've already received some substantial gifts, some as high as $10,000," she said.

The campaign was slated to kick off at a special meeting in Ottawa on Nov. 19, with Moshe Rivlin, world chair of Keren Kayemeth Le'Israel, as the principal speaker.

Frankenberg said the municipality of Jerusalem has given the JNF a parcel of land in the southwestern part of the city. JNF, she said, will convert it into a park suitable for picnics "and as a place for people to come and relax."

The size of the open air amphitheatre has not yet been determined, but it will provide facilities for concerts and other entertainment. The Jerusalem-Tel Aviv railway will build a new depot near the park to allow for out-of-town visitors.

Frankenburg said it is hoped work on the project will be completed and the park dedicated by the end of 1996.

Another JNF undertaking for Jerusalem 3000 will be the establishment of a children's garden in the Jerusalem peace forest, to be financed by children around the world who will be asked to donate $18 each. This will be an educational project handled through the JNF's educational department.

Canadian children will play a major role in raising funds for the program, said Frankenburg.

Chrétien failing to follow up referendum reprieve

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — The government has been frittering away the past month since the referendum. Time is running out.

Jean Chrétien just doesn't seem to get it. He goes around comparing himself to Joe Carter hitting a home run in the bottom of the ninth to win the World Series for the Blue Jays.

It was more like Chrétien being asleep at home plate and getting to first base on a third strike wild pitch.

It was ordinary Canadians who woke up Chrétien in the final days of the campaign by organizing their own rally in Montreal. The best Chrétien could contribute was a couple of somewhat lacklustre speeches in the final week.

Now Chrétien has the temerity to criticize Radio-Canada for not giving more coverage to his five-minute protocol speech at the United Nations on Oct. 22. Perhaps the network was more concerned with the country coming apart back home.

The federalists didn't win the Oct. 30 referendum; they only won a reprieve. If they use it well, they can turn it into a convincing win. The next few months are crucial.

They must show they really meant what they said about Quebec being a cherished, respected, full and valued partner in Confederation, by giving it the special means to protect its distinct language and culture, help it survive and even flourish.

It won't be easy. There's a lot of hatred against Quebec in this country. There are many people who still don't see Quebec as distinct, or deserving of any kind of special status or special powers that they don't have themselves.

They would rather break up the country than give anything special to Quebec.

In the last week of the campaign, Chrétien promised Quebecers that if they voted Yes, he would do something to recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

This was a big admission for Chrétien, who had always seen Quebec as just like the other provinces apart from having a lot of people who speak French.

Pierre Trudeau turned around the 1980 Quebec referendum campaign by promising to do a good deal for Quebec at the constitutional table.

Lucien Bouchard repeatedly reminded Quebecers last month how Trudeau later reneged on his promise.

History appears to be repeating itself. Chrétien has gone back to international meanderings — heading off recently to a Commonwealth conference in New Zealand, a visit to Japan and a Francophonie talkfest in Africa.

The country is still in crisis. Nothing has changed for the better in Canada since Oct. 30.

Already Western premiers such as Alberta's Ralph Klein and British Columbia's Mike Harcourt are saying Quebec is not really a distinct society that needs special powers different from other provinces.

Newfoundland's Clyde Wells seems to be moving away from his earlier acceptance of Quebec's distinctive nature.

And it turns out that New Brunswick's Frank McKenna, who made a big show of taking part in the people's rally at Place du Canada, used the visit to lure Quebec businessmen to relocate in his province, taking advantage of their vulnerability and confusion at that time.

As they listen to the Western premiers and watch Chrétien touring the world, Quebecers suspect they have been sucked in once again by federal promises and tearful professions of love from the rest of Canada.

A poll two weeks ago in Le Devoir showed 53 per cent of Quebecers don't believe Chrétien will be able to deliver on his promise last month.

More surprisingly, 67 per cent of Quebecers are ready for another referendum within a few years.

Meanwhile the separatists smell blood and are moving in for the kill. They plan to wait a little while for the dust to settle, choose a controversial issue, move in Bouchard as premier, and then lower the boom, with either a referendum election, or an election followed by another referendum.

It could be all over within two years.

Meanwhile, rather than taking advantage of the momentum of Oct. 30 and using its window of opportunity to stage a comeback, the federal government in Ottawa appears to be moving on to other issues. Chrétien appears to have moved out of the country entirely.

A cabinet committee of eight ministers, nicknamed the Dream Team (quickly re-named the Nightmare Squad by the news media), was told to come up with a constitutional plan by Christmas. Included are Heritage Minister Michel Dupuy, Indian Affairs Minister Ron Irwin and Employment Minister Lloyd Axworthy.

Chrétien did not bring in Conservative leader Jean Charest, nor Quebec Liberal leader Daniel Johnson, nor No co-chair Michel Bélanger. There is much reason for concern with this approach.

Given the nasty mood of the Western premiers, real constitutional change is hardly possible at this point.

And it is even more doubtful that the Parti Québecois (PQ) government, so close to winning the whole shooting match in a few months, would agree to any constitutional changes to allow Quebec to stay in Canada.

Ottawa can win it only by doing an end-run around the PQ, making an offer to Quebecers that they just can't refuse, to prove once and for all to them the benefits of staying in Canada (apart from having a nice red flag and being on a bigger team in the 1996 Olympics).

It could be something such as a national jobs plan, an all-out war on joblessness, funded by Ottawa. Only provinces who stay in Canada could take part.

The Liberals could wage this all-out war on joblessness with the same energy and determination they have showed in slashing the deficit, cutting social programs and laying off people since they came to office.

Jobs are still the No. 1 issue in Quebec. It wouldn't take a constitutional change, nobody would get bogged down in silly semantics and definitions, and the Western premiers wouldn't get riled up.

It would cost money; it would throw the Liberals off their neo-Conservative agenda for awhile, but if it saved the country, it would be worth it.

It certainly would have a better chance of succeeding than listening to Clyde Wells describe Quebec at the constitutional table.

Israel pledges to bar entry of extremist Jews

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Extremist Jews will be barred from entering Israel, the cabinet pledged last Sunday.

Subversive groups in the country will also be disbanded.

"The government will not permit Jews from abroad to come to Israel as immigrants, tourists, residents or citizens, if they express support for organizations which have been outlawed or if they have expressed support or have supported acts of violence," a cabinet statement said.

"Extremist violence, racist and terrorist organizations are a serious danger to the democratic rule of Israel, the security of the state and peace of the public," cabinet Secretary Shmuel Hollander told reporters. "The government will act to make them illegal."

The cabinet move, made in the wake of the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, coincided with the first hearings of Israel's three-member state commission of inquiry on the security lapses that led to the assassination.

Ministers agreed to appoint a special task force to look into the legal implications of the proposed crackdown on extremist groups.

The task force will be comprised of representatives from the attorney general's office, the police, the Israel Defence Force general staff and the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security service.

The Law of Return, which grants citizenship to any Jew who wishes to immigrate, includes a clause that allows the Interior Ministry to refuse entry if there is concern that an individual may pose a threat to public safety.

Last week, Interior Minister Ehud Barak barred a Kach activist from New York from entering Israel.

Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein rejected complaints from the opposition Likud that the crackdown on right-wing extremists amounted to a "witch-hunt," in the aftermath of Rabin's murder.

"There is no shred of evidence to that effect," Rubinstein told Israel Radio. "It is our duty to fight Jewish terrorism."

Meanwhile, the state commission of inquiry into the assassination heard the first secret testimony from security officials charged with protecting Rabin and other Israeli leaders.

The three-member panel, headed by former Supreme Court chief justice Meir Shamgar, will convene in mostly closed-door sessions three to four times a week.

The commission expects to conclude its work within two months, according to local press reports.

The panel commission will investigate the security lapses that enabled confessed assassin Yigal Amir to get within point-blank shooting range of Rabin at the conclusion of a Nov. 4 rally in Tel Aviv.

It will also address questions surrounding the security service's intelligence-gathering efforts.

Shin Bet officials have admitted that they failed to follow up on tips from those who knew Amir, that an assassination was planned.

Amid heavy security, the head of the Shin Bet was among the security officials who appeared before the panel Sunday.

The commission convened amid reports that Avishai Raviv, leader of the extremist militant group Eyal, had been working for the Shin Bet for the past two years.

Raviv was among eight people arrested in a police crackdown on activists suspected of involvement in an alleged right-wing assassination conspiracy.

The Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported that Raviv knew Amir, "but didn't know or didn't report his intentions."

The allegations were denied by government officials, the Shin Bet and Raviv, who is currently under house arrest at his parents' home in Holon.

Police Minister Moshe Shahal accused right-wing activists of spreading the rumors in order to discredit the Shin Bet.

In a related development, two suspects arrested in connection with the shooting, Ohad Skornick and Michael Epstein, had their detention extended as police continued investigating their involvement in the assassination plot.

Suspected assassins arrested

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Palestinian police last week arrested five Arabs in the Gaza Strip on suspicion of plotting the assassination of PLO leader Yasser Arafat.

The five were said to be followers of terrorist Abu Nidal, who has been at odds with Arafat ever since he broke away from the PLO leader in the 1970s.

A Palestinian security official said last Wednesday that the five came from Libya and Algeria a week earlier, adding that they were arrested after crossing into Gaza from Egypt.

The official added that security had been stepped up around Arafat in the wake of the Nov. 4 assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Abu Nidal, whose real name is Sabri al-Banna, is wanted in the United States and Europe for a string of terrorist activities.

Guard your tongue

PART 1 OF 2

What lessons for the Jewish family can we infer from the terrible events in Israel recently?

According to Rabbi Israel Meyer Hakohen, also know as the Chofetz Chaim, one of the greatest Torah sages of all time, God requires caution in speech even more than in sight or hearing because speech can determine life and death: "Life and death are in the hands of the tongue" (Mishlei 18:21). We all now feel the horrible dread. We no longer have to reach back into Jewish history before our time to bear witness to the Torah view of slander or gossip (even if true), which is that evil words not only lead to evil deeds, but that character assassination is in itself murder, albeit murder of someone's name and reputation.

Before Prime Minister Rabin's murder, many Rabbis in Canada denounced the language of animosity and warned of catastrophic results if the name-calling within the Jewish people, from every political stripe, did not stop. Several weeks before the assassination, Orthodox Rabbi Baruch Taub of Toronto, the spiritual leader of Canada's largest orthodox congregation, publically admonished his kehilla and Jews everywhere to debate their differences with civility and kindness, and denounced the slanderous portrayal of Jewish leaders of both the right and left, whether in Israel or in the diaspora. He specifically warned that if the bad language continued, Jewish history would repeat itself. Causeless hatred among Jews not only accounted for the destruction of our ancient Temple but was the basis of the in-fighting from Herod's time thorough the schisms of misnagdim vs. chassidic Jews and the lack of serious dialogue between Zionists, Socialists (Bund) and observant Jews in the period between World War I and II. All Jews ultimately payed the price for such slanderous behaviour.

When unified, the Jewish people, with God's help, can create amazing wonders against all natural odds; witness the Six Day war ("and on the seventh He rested") and the survival of the Talmud and our people after so much persecution, the raid on the Entebbe airport, the Exodus of Russian and Ethiopian Jews, the freeing of Syrian Jewry.

Settlers facing an uncertain future

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In public relations terms, the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin may well deal the settlement movement a serious blow.

Yigal Amir — the confessed killer — is a zealous supporter of the settlers, while two of his suspected accomplices now in custody are residents of West Bank settlements.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

These facts, combined with the nation-wide shock and revulsion caused by Rabin's murder, will probably tarnish the settlers' already battered image.

Even before Amir — a member of the religious nationalist camp — murdered Rabin, opinion polls in Israel had shown that the Israeli public was largely unsympathetic with the settlers' broad goals.

In the wake of the assassination, these sentiments are likely to grow, much to the horror of the settlers. "These fatal bullets may have ... sealed our fate," declared Yisrael Harel, head of the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza, shortly after Rabin's burial in Jerusalem.

Shlomo and Geula Amir, parents of Yitzhak Rabin's confessed killer Yigal Amir, arrive in a Tel Aviv court on Nov. 12 to attend a hearing for their son Hagai, also suspected in connection with the killing. RNS photo

Time will tell whether Harel is right. But even if he is not overstating the case, he was certainly voicing a deep-seated fear, which may yet come to pass.

And if this happens, Amir and company will be regarded as the unintended gravediggers of the settlement movement, which was inspired by Israel's victory in the Six Day War.

From their pinched point of view, Amir and his bedfellows had reason to revile Rabin. The late prime minister froze the construction of new settlements in the territories. He distinguished between "political" and "security" outposts. He asserted that the settlers, whom he derided as "cry babies," contributed practically nothing to Israel's security. He announced his intention to "dry up" the settlements.

Furthermore, Rabin rejected their argument that Israel is dutybound to preserve the Land of Israel under Israeli sovereignty. And worse still, his government signed three major agreements with the PLO under which Israel agreed to relinquish segments of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to the Palestinians, the settlers' mortal and undying enemy.

A Talmud scholar and the son of a Torah scribe, Amir was so outraged by Rabin's policy that he participated in the so-called "battle of the hills" in the West Bank last summer.

In these tense encounters, the focus of which was the barren, uninhabited hilltops of Givat Hadagan, settlers resisted police who had been ordered to evict them.

The settlers were there to establish new "facts on the ground" and to demonstrate their vehement opposition to the Oslo peace process.

Their presence at Givat Hadagan and elsewhere was part of a civil disobedience campaign in which settlers and their sympathizers blocked highways, staged massive sit-ins, scuffled with police and the army and denounced the government as traitorous.

Comparing themselves to U.S. civil rights protesters, an analogy which rang false to their critics, the settlers claimed that they were merely engaging in non-violent protests.

The government thought otherwise. The police minister charged that the settlers were planning "a civil rebellion." The minister of education observed: "We are witnessing an unparalleled display of unlawful disturbance." The attorney general ordered police to investigate the leaders of Zo Artzeinu (This is our Land), which organized some of the demonstrations.

The settlers greeted these accusations with contempt. After the Oslo 2 accord was signed in Washington, they returned to Givat Hadagan, in what was a vain effort to establish dwellings. They also squatted in hundreds of vacant buildings in the territories which the Ministry of Housing refuses to sell or to rent.

Comprising 2.5 per cent of Israel's population, the settlers are hardly a homogenious group. About one-third are ideologically and religiously motivated. Another one-third are "economic" settlers, drawn by the prospect of cheaper homes and a better quality of life. The rest fall somewhere in between.

The most vocal, of course, are the ideologues, who would stay in the West Bank or Gaza under any conditions. But they are in a minority. The majority of settlers would leave if these areas fell under Palestinian jurisdiction.

Under the Oslo 2 agreement, Israel is to maintain control of settlements and military bases (Area C), which sit on 70 per cent of the West Bank. But in final status talks, scheduled to begin next spring, Israel is likely to cede still more land to the Palestinians, further enraging the settlers and setting the stage for further confrontations with the government.

The Week in Israel

Nov 13

• At a special session of the Labor party's central committee, Shimon Peres was unanimously elected party leader and its candidate for prime minister. Peres told the central committee that five years will be needed to arrive at a comprehensive peace with Syria, Lebanon and the Palestinians.

• Israeli Air Force jets attacked Hezbollah targets south of Beirut. It was the first air force operation in southern Lebanon since nine IDF soldiers were killed there last month.

Nov.14

• Davar Rishon reported that U.S. Middle East Coordinator, Ambassador Dennis Ross, is scheduled to visit Israel in the near future to attempt to find ways to renew talks with Syria. (It was subsequently confirmed that Ross would arrive in the region on Nov. 18.)

Nov. 15

• In officially asking Shimon Peres to form a new government, President Ezer Weizman said: "In conferring upon you the task of forming the government, I am also giving you full support for the continuation of the peace process ... It is my fervent hope that we will know how to root out from our midst any trace of the contorted conception which led to the grave disaster that has befallen us and that we will find the way to improve understanding and unity in the nation."

Nov. 16

• Maariv reported a dramatic meeting in Brussels between two officials from the Israeli and Syrian foreign ministries.

Nov. 17

• Ha'aretz reported that a network of caves containing tombs of the Hashmonean dynasty was discovered near the city of Modi'in. It is the first time any archeological object with the name "Hashmonai" has been found. The discovery reinforces the belief that the ancient and modern cities of Modi'in share the same site.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• Four hundred people were expected at a conference organized by Hadassah University Hospital of the International Society for AIDS Education.

• One thousand people were expected to attend the 13th World Congress on Endourology. The conference was organized by the Beilinson Medical Centre.

Rabbi accused of inspiring violence

responsibility'' for the assassination of Rabin. He made the charge after hearing a recording of a radio program in which Rabinovitch discussed whether Rabin could be regarded as a ''moser'' — someone who ''hands over other Jews to non-Jewish authorities.'' Bin-Nun maintains that the rabbi effectively branded the prime minister a moser. ''Whoever heard that broadcast could take those words one step further,'' said Bin-Nun. ''Clearly there is no criminal responsibility (on the part of Rabinovitch) but there is indirect moral and spiritual responsibility.''

Rabbi Nahum Rabinovitch

Rabbi Rabinovitch denies labelling Rabin a ''moser'' and notes that during the radio program, he stated clearly that ''it is forbidden to attack anyone, including the prime minister or even a soldier.''

Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron said he believes Rabbi Rabinovitch was falsely implicated.

But last week, another figure in the religious community produced a tape recording in which Rabbi Rabinovitch advocates the use of explosives against IDF soldiers to prevent them from evacuating Jews from settlements in the territories.

Yitzhak Frankenthal, secretary-general of the religious peace movement Oz VeShalom, released a transcript of a private conversation he held with Rabbi Rabinovitch in April.

During the conversation, Rabbi Rabinovitch is asked what he would do if the government decided to evacuate Nezarim, an isolated settlement in the Gaza Strip. Rabbi Rabinovitch answers that he would personally block the soldiers by sitting on the grass or pavement and hopes that thousands would join him.

He is then asked what if settlers are forcibly evacuated one-by-one as they were in Yamit (a settlement in Sinai).

Rabbi Rabinovitch responds: ''If they come to evacuate us, I say, and I don't know whether it's possible, but if this is a possibility, I say the whole area should be planted with explosives like the Arabs do. That's what we will do.''

Frankenthal asks: ''And then IDF soldiers will die?''

Rabbi Rabinovitch responds: ''IDF soldiers should know. We will tell them: 'Don't you dare approach.' ''

Frankenthal: ''And if the IDF continue to carry out their orders?''

Rabbi Rabinovitch: ''If they carry out their orders they are evil, truly evil.''

Later in the conversation, Frankenthal asks if Rabbi Rabinovitch really means that he would use explosives against IDF soldiers to prevent the evacuation of settlements and that the deaths of those soldiers wouldn't matter because they are ''evil criminals.''

''That's right,'' responds the rabbi.

Rabbi Rabinovitch is one of nine rabbis who issued a controversial ruling in July forbidding soldiers from evacuating army bases or settlements in the West Bank. He would not comment specifically on Frankenthal's tape, saying only, ''All accusations against me are false.''

Frankenthal says he first met with Rabbi Rabinovitch in April, in an attempt to find 20 rabbis — 10 from the right wing and 10 from the left — who would be willing to sign a joint proclamation against violence. The effort proved fruitless.

''I was so shocked by the views expressed by the rabbi that I decided to return for a second meeting, this time with a hidden tape recorder,'' Frankenthal told The CJN. ''I didn't think anyone would believe me if I said that such a respected rabbi could hold such views.''

He then brought the tape recording to a prominent settlement leader and rabbi who, according to Frankenthal, dismissed Rabbi Rabinovitch as ''marginal'' and ''not a source of concern.''

Frankenthal — whose son, a soldier, was killed by Hamas terrorists seven months ago — is demanding that Rabbi Rabinovitch be removed from the hesder yeshivah that he heads. In a hesder yeshivah, students combine religious studies with military service.

''A man with such views should not be in a position to influence youth,'' said Frankenthal.

During the secretly-taped conversation, Rabbi Rabinovitch repeatedly compared the situation in Israel today to that of Nazi Germany, saying that IDF soldiers who obey orders to evacuate settlements are no different from German soldiers who obeyed orders. He also called the evacuation of people from their homes ''an act of war,'' and said that ''as soon as they start talking about deporting Jews, it's an attempt to do what the Nazis did.''

In a Jerusalem Post opinion column published in July 1993, Rabbi Rabinovitch compared the present leadership of Israel to the Judenrat, the Council of the Jews that unwittingly cooperated with the Nazis in handing over Jews.

In the article, he writes that the Judenrat was ''charged with implementing aspects of German policy leading up to the Final Solution,'' and concludes that ''the reasoning which motivated the men of the Judenrat 50 years ago ... summarizes what some of our leadership is telling us today. Everything is different, yet nothing has changed — not even the words!''

The campaign to weed out extremist rabbis has sharply divided the religious camp. Since Rabbi Bin-Nun spoke out, he has received numerous death threats and is accompanied everywhere by armed bodyguards. Parents in the religious seminary where he teaches have demanded his resignation.

However, 46 per cent of Israelis who define themselves as religious Zionists identify with Rabbi Bin-Nun's struggle, according to a Dahaf poll published in the Hebrew daily Yediot Aharanot. Thirty-one per cent do not identify with his struggle, while eight per cent condemn it.

Peres addresses federations

It was 4:30 a.m.in Jerusalem when he began, and throughout his remarks, Peres referred to the sleeping city and the approaching sunrise as a unifying metaphor for the promise of a new dawn, which he said would finally arrive with peace, and on whose threshold he believed the Jewish people were now standing.

His message was bold and confident: "An attempt to build a new society is taking place before our very own eyes." He urged the Jewish communities of North America to join in the attempt.

Leah Rabin regrets television appearance

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The widow of slain Israeli leader Yitzhak Rabin has expressed regrets over having taking part in a special telecast last week of the ABC-TV news program Nightline, which was broadcast live from the Jerusalem Theatre.

Leah Rabin, who participated in the show via a linkup from her Tel Aviv home, later told Israel Radio that the program had only served to escalate tensions which have surfaced in Israeli society in the wake of her husband's assassination.

The show "exists precisely to fan the flames," she said, adding, "this is not the time yet for such debates and definitely not on our TV screens."

The show, which was broadcast on Israel Television as well as to North America late last Tuesday night, was moderated by Ted Koppel, who interviewed panel members from both sides of the political spectrum and sought comments from audience members in the theatre.

Focusing on Israel's political and social climate in the aftermath of the assassination, the special "Town Meeting" program drew millions of viewers, according to the show's producers.

During the show, Rabin explained why she shook hands with PLO leader Yasser Arafat when he came on a condolence call to her Ramat Aviv home, but has expressed reservations about shaking hands with Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

"The handshake [of Yitzhak Rabin] two years ago with Yasser Arafat symbolized hope, and the beginning of a new road" toward peace, she said. "The handshake with Mr. Netanyahu did not."

In recent interviews, Rabin has been sharply critical of Netanyahu and other right-wing leaders for permitting hot political rhetoric to escalate against her husband in the weeks prior to the assassination.

Like Rabin, Netanyahu and Prime Minister Shimon Peres took part in the show via linkups from other locations in the country.

Peres, looking drawn and tired, repeated the call for reconciliation.

"We have to stop by all means the acts of violence, the support for terror, whether verbal or physical, and go on," he said.

Alleged SS war criminal to get free legal counsel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — A German law firm has decided to represent former SS captain Erich Priebke for free when he goes to trial on war crimes charges in Italy.

Heinrich Wirtz, a partner in the Berlin firm of Anwaltsburo Andreas Schultz, arrived last week in the Andean resort town of San Carlos di Bariloche, where Priebke has lived openly under his own name since 1948.

"We think Mr. Priebke is innocent," said Wirtz. "We shall help him free of charge as a matter of humanity."

"We are not Nazis," Wirtz said. "We do this because this might be the last case involving Germans in relation to the war."

Wirtz said Priebke had contacted the Berlin law firm on the "recommendation of his many friends in Berlin."

Argentina's Supreme Court ruled Nov. 2 that Priebke be extradited to Italy to stand trial for his involvement in the 1944 massacre of 335 Romans — 75 of them Jewish — at the Ardeatine Caves south of Rome.

The massacre is regarded as the worst war crime committed on Italian soil.

The Argentine Supreme Court decision overturned an appeals court ruling three months ago refusing extradition.

Legal disputes delayed the formal ruling to extradite Priebke for more than a year.

Priebke, 82, has been under house arrest in Argentina since May 9. He is awaiting the arrival of an Italian police unit that will accompany him to Italy.

Just following orders

According to local reports, Priebke's health is deteriorating. His doctor maintained that he fell into a state of depression in the wake of the Supreme Court ruling, adding he has high blood pressure and is suffering from senility.

Priebke, in a rare interview granted to the English-language Buenos Aires Herald, said he was ailing "in bed and feeling down, down."

Priebke has admitted taking part in the massacre, but said he was just following orders and would have been killed himself if he had refused to participate.

In the interview, he maintained that he was charged in the Ardeatine massacre "because I'm the only one left alive after 50 years."

Argentine Justice Minister Rodolfo Barra, who was in Italy this month to meet with Italian officials about Priebke's case, dismissed reports that Priebke was too ill to be extradited.

Last Tuesday, the Argentine Supreme Court rejected a last-ditch effort by Priebke's lawyer to appeal the extradition. The court's ruling officially opened the way for Priebke's transfer to Italy to proceed as planned.

Italy's military prosecutor, Antonio Intelisano, said he would charge Priebke with "multiple murder, cruelty to prisoners and conspiracy to kill."

Intelisano reportedly said a preliminary hearing is scheduled for Dec. 7.

Tullia Zevi, president of the Union of Italian Jewish communities, said the extradition would be "positive for the image of both Italy, which seeks justice for its victims, and for Argentina, which in the past showed too much tolerance in accepting and supporting tens, if not hundreds, of Nazis and escaping fascists."

Orthodox Synagogue Baseball League

Shaarei Shomayim Roadrunners are champs

Special to The CJN

As a cool breeze swept through the ball yard, the Shaarei Shomayim Roadrunners swept past Clanton Park to claim their first-ever championship of the Orthodox Synagogue Baseball League.

They beat Clanton Park in two straight games out of three by scores of 14-9 and 12-11.

In Game 1, the home team Roadrunners took to the field with a deep desire to win. "We played our game," noted team captain Reuven Spiegel. In an awesome display of power, the team hit and ran into a lead from which Clanton Park could not recover.

The first three batters were the key to success. First baseman Steven Ekstein, a first-year player, said: "We knew we had to hit them hard, hit them early and hit them often. Man-O-Man-Ashevitz, we sure did it!"

Noam Rotenberg, another rookie, distinguished himself by getting on base five times. Rotenberg never flinched, never got riled and never played with more intensity. "There are people who play a lifetime and never have the good fortune to play for a winner. I'm just pleased to have made the team and to have made a meaningful contribution," he said.

It was nip and tuck all the way until the seventh inning. With all cylinders pumping, the Roadrunners broke the game wide open, sending 10 men to the plate. Jared "Boom-boom" Green got the inning going by crushing a homerun to deep, deep left field.

Green's roundtripper was one of three hits that included a single and a double. Green scored three runs, which along with a walk, put him on base four out of five times.

"Jared just responds to the situation," noted Spiegel. "He was like our Eveready battery, he just kept on hitting and hitting and hitting. With his genes, his family name and his bat, hey, he could be president of Shaarei Shomayim one day."

In the end, the Roadrunners took Game 1 in commanding fashion.

Borrowing from Kentucky Wildcat coach Rich Patino, the Roadrunners took to the field for Game 2 with only one thought in mind: There is no tomorrow.

Lorie Weisbrod, sparkplug and one of the original Roadrunners, stepped to the plate in Game 2 and smashed a homerun. Before his night was over, Weisbrod would add three singles to his totals.

Weisbrod was also flawless in the field, closing the gaps and gunning down a runner at third base to end a Clanton Park rally.

Batting second, Rotenberg continued his tear with a monster triple, scoring Weisbrod. Rotenberg went three for five, scoring each time he reached base.

'A lot of heart'

Shortstop Marc Koplowitz, who had a strong game in the field, said "this team has a lot of talent and a lot of heart."

Spiegel, who, against the better judgement of his loving wife, played the entire season, took over at second base for the playoffs. "I was tight as a drum. I knew we had what it takes to win and I couldn't help thinking, 'Clear off the mantle, Mom, we're bringing home the hardware.' "

He went two for five and though he could not get a hold of the long ball, he scored a key run and was as ecstatic as a new father.

Ekstein remained strong at first base and Jay Heller was as solid as any catcher since Yonatan Bench of the Cincinnati Reds. Heller went two for five and was on the receiving end of a putout at home plate. Solid as the rocks in the Judean Desert, the putout was a turning point in the game.

Green was four for five with two, count 'em, two homeruns, and the game-winning RBI.

"His timing was excellent," remarked Spiegel. "If it were in the budget, I'd give him a raise."

Seven shutout innings

Stu Shaul, pitcher of record, ended the 1995 campaign undefeated. At the plate, Shaul was three for five with a triple in the eighth inning. Backed by a leakproof defence, Shaul pitched seven shutout innings. In fact, it wasn't until the fifth inning that a runner even reached third base.

Dependable veteran Hart Heller snagged the last out in right field and in an instant, history was made.

Final score, Roadrunners 12, Clanton Park 11.

To celebrate, the team got together for a bite to eat and bought tickets for the brotherhood draw.

The '95 Roadrunners include: Reuven Spiegel, Stuart Shaul, Noam Rotenberg, Lorie Weisbrod, Hart Heller, Jay Heller, Yigal Rifkind, Jerome Green, Steven Ekstein, Danny Weisbrod, Jordan Gnat, Marc Koplowitz, Shai Scherer, Josh Rifkind and Jared Green.

Economic boom in Israel expected to continue

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Israel's economy should continue to boom for at least the next several years predicts an Israeli economist.

"As long as the peace process continues, the economy will do well," Dr. Elharan Helpman says.

Helpman, laureate of the Israel Prize in Economics, spoke at a lecture sponsored by Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, the day after Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

He said Rabin became more involved with economic issues in the last few years. "As the peace process developed, he became more and more interested, because he saw the economic development of Israel as part and parcel of the peace process."

Helpman said both the peace process and the mass immigration of Jews from the former Soviet Union have served to shape the evolution of the Israeli economy.

"The mass increase in population has increased tremendously the demand for goods and services, especially housing. As a result, there is a housing shortage which has caused prices to skyrocket. As well, people had to be absorbed into the labor force and jobs had to be produced to suit the number of immigrants with high education."

He said the peace process has generated optimistic thinking with regards to investment. "As a result of increased investment, the capital flow has increased. Some people hope that the peace process will generate fruitful interaction between Israel and neighboring economies."

But he said the Middle East is unusual as an economic union because very little trade goes on between neighboring countries.

"There is a large income gap between Israel and Jordan or Syria; so there is a different demand for goods, which in turn reduces trade," he explained.

He said the peace process, however, has helped increase trade between countries because some companies have established partnerships and have begun manufacturing in several countries. "Cooperation has spread out around the region. Given the fears that some Arabs have of the domination of the Israeli economy, they find this cooperation less oppressive.

"The peace process has opened many doors to Israel in other countries, such as Japan and India, which is important, because with the big influx of labor, one needs markets. In the last several years, excluding 1993, Israel's economy has had a growth rate exceeding six per cent. It would not be possible to grow like this by depending merely on domestic markets. The doors that opened in Asia have been critical."

Hi-tech exports make up about three-quarters of Israel's total exports, Helpman said, and have become such a large part of the market that they have generated a shift in manpower. "There is now an extremely high demand for hi-tech workers and we believe that this pattern will continue."

Asked how significant U.S. aid is for Israel's economy, Helpman replied that its significance is declining because the dollar amount is fixed each year.

"It has been the same for many years; so as Israel's economy grows, the share of aid shrinks."

Helpman is an incumbent of the Archie Sherman Chair in International Economic Relations at Tel Aviv University and director of The Economic Growth and Policy Program of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research.

Scitex to lay off hundreds of employees

JERUSALEM – Scitex, the Herzliyah-based world leader in electronic pre-press systems, will lay off hundreds of its employees due to the deterioration in its performance, the Telegraph financial daily reported.

Scitex reported third-quarter losses of $36.4 million (U.S.) compared with losses of $12.2 million in the same period last year.

The results, released two weeks ago, included an $18 million non-recurring cost for employee termination benefits. The company, which has a 40 per cent market share in its field, will terminate 100 of its 1,200 workers immediately, after which it will dismiss a considerable amount of its 500 temporary workers.

Scitex has been meeting difficulties collecting debts from some of its American customers, according to analysts. Consequently the company had to write off $25 million from its second quarter earnings which totaled $182 million. Scitex's NYSE traded stock, which sold as recently as April for $23 has dropped to just over $14.

Film shows link with Jewish past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Simcha Jacobovici

Variously known as New Christians, Conversos or Marranos, they were Spanish and Portuguese Jews who, in the 14th and 15th centuries, converted to Christianity out of fear, convenience or pressure.

Neither fish nor fowl, they inhabited a twilight zone, caught between the rituals and faith of Roman Catholicism and Judaism.

Hounded and hunted down by the authorities for "heretical" practices, and the object of scorn, pity and contempt by Jews, the Conversos were a pathetic and sorry lot, the end product of anti-Semitism and the Inquisition.

Eventually, the vast majority of their ancestors were absorbed into Christian society. But amazingly enough, some maintained a tenuous, flickering link with their misty Jewish past.

This is the topic of Simcha Jacobovici's newest documentary, Expulsion and Memory, which will be previewed at Beth Tzedec Synagogue on Nov. 28 at 7:45 p.m. The special screening is under the auspices of the new leadership division of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Jacobovici's one-hour film ranges far and wide, from Spain and Portugal to Israel, New Mexico and Toronto. He looks for, and meets, Catholics of Converso descent and, conversely, Marranos who returned to their Jewish roots.

All in all, it's a fascinating story and Jacobovici tells it with the aplomb of an experienced filmmaker.

In New Mexico, where he converses with several Hispanics who've reclaimed their Jewish patrimony, he's led to a Christian cemetery. There, with their assistance, he finds Hebrew lettering and a six-pointed flower on several of the gravestones.

Speaking to a Jewish historian, Jacobovici discovers that the first permanent Spanish colony in New Mexico, in 1578, was made up of crypto-Jews.

In Toronto, the camera pans on Maria Santos, a Portuguese Canadian who lights Sabbath candles on Friday at dusk, without quite knowing the reason.

Her daughter, Lena Shaw, explains that she is merely being faithful to a family custom passed from one generation to the next. But curiously enough, Shaw never realized until her meeting with Jacobovici that it is a distinctly Jewish custom.

In the Spanish village of Hervas, a man who can trace his lineage back to Jews reluctantly confesses that he "lives in conflict," evidently torn between two religions.

His confession is juxtaposed against the remarks of a precocious, voluble boy who observes: "In this town, if you go far back enough, we're all Jewish."

Jacobovici takes this statement at face value, without investigating the claim. But in the following segment, set in Israel, he encounters Nissan Ben-Avraham, a former New Christian from the Spanish island of Mallorca who reconverted to Judaism and was "brought back to the right place."

Further on, in Belmonte, Portugual, we're introduced to a community of New Christians who apparently live in harmony with their Old Christian neighbors.

The Judaism of these New Christians, we're told, has evolved differently. Few details are offered, nor are any of the New Christians interviewed.

Expulsion and Memory draws on the expertise of Toronto writer Erna Paris, whose book on the Inquisition, The End of Days, has just been published.

The movie ends on a high note, amid the joyousness of a Sephardi festival in Toledo, Spain.

Vision TV focuses on Ashrawi

Animated by "a grand vision" of peace in the Middle East, Hanan Ashrawi is indubitably the finest spokesperson of the Palestinian cause, an articulate 47-year-old Christian woman from Ramallah whose message has resounded around the world.

The subject of a sympathetic Vision TV profile scheduled to air on Nov. 24 at 9 p.m, she is presented as a dedicated and committed patriot, as an author (This Side of Peace, published earlier this year), as a mother and a wife, and as a human rights advocate.

First glimpsed boiling Turkish coffee in her home, adjacent to an Israeli prison, Ashrawi is then seen against the backdrop of Arab protests, Israeli evictions of Palestinians, intimate family gatherings and business meetings.

She is certainly a woman of her time, a strong, self-confident person in a patriarchal society where women are usually relegated to household tasks.

A professor of English literature at Birzeit University, Ashrawi emerged from virtual obscurity during the 1991 Arab-Israeli peace talks in Madrid, where, she claims, "the battle for peace" began.

Unwilling to accept a high-profile position in the Gaza-based Palestine National Authority PNA), she founded the Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizen's Rights, whose objective is to put civil liberties on the Palestinian agenda.

To her regret, the PNA has violated the rights of far too many Palestinians far too often. Ashrawi, having investigated these cases, says: "Nobody is above the law."

Clearly, she is disappointed with the results of the Oslo agreements, using such words as "pathetic" and "restricted" to describe the parameters of Palestinian self-rule until now.

Yet Ashrawi does not appear to be a pessimist. With her Arab and Israeli cohorts, she dreams of the peace of the brave.

Toronto actress delighted to bask in the Sunset

By JUDY SIBLIN-RAKOFF
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Anyone who has ever seen Barbara Barsky on stage, knows she's special. Even in ensemble pieces, her inimitable magic and sparkle come through.

So it was not surprising to learn that Barsky would be the standby for one of the most coveted roles in musical theatre, Norma Desmond in Sunset Boulevard.

Being the standby to Diahann Carroll is a departure for Barsky, who has never been an understudy before, but it was also the opportunity of a lifetime to be part of this $12-million musical adapted from Billy Wilder's 1950 film noir.

Once she masters this role, she can perform it anywhere. Barsky has a green card to work in the United States and is able to work in England.

It all began with a call from the casting person at Live Entertainment, asking Barsky to audition for Sunset Boulevard. There were seven auditions, from Toronto to New York. Number 2 was a dance audition. Number 3 was meeting musical director Paul Woolgate. And audition Number 4 was to do a coaching session with him.

What would have been her fifth callback was an invitation to come and be seen by the award-winning director, Trevor Nunn. But Barabara couldn't make it because she had a rehearsal in San Diego for another production.

"Well, that door's closed to me now," she remembers thinking. "I went as far as I could, I did the best work I could and now it's over."

But that wasn't the end of the story. Barsky was called back and asked if she would fly to New York to be seen by Nunn.

She and Marek Norman (her husband of 15 years, collaborator, pianist, musical director and often fellow actor) drove to New York.

The audition was held at 890 Broadway, where Barsky had spent many happy hours in New York as an actress and designer. Her husband played the piano for her at the audition — Number 6.

"I have no idea what they really want me for, so ignorance is bliss. And I get to sing for Trevor Nunn, and I admire him so much ... and I was also singing for the first time for Garth Drabinsky, who I had worked with 20 years before. I saw a blur of faces, and Mr. Nunn comes and greets me at the door, introduces himself in a very quiet voice, walks over to the piano with me, completely puts me at ease."

Barbara Barsky as Norma Desmond

After one more audition that evening, she and Marek returned to Canada. Half way there they called for messages and found out there was some kind of offer. Her agent called to say that she'd been asked to stand by for Diahann Carroll.

So how did she feel, and what will it be like when she actually gets to do it?

"My friend has a fabulous analogy. She says it's like being a fireman. You're sitting around, you're chatting with the guys, you're in an ever-ready state of mind, and when the alarm rings you hit that pole and you're on stage," Barsky said.

"I also have to get used to what will happen when the stage manager says, 'We regret to announce that tonight the role of Norma Desmond will not be played by Diahann Caroll, but by Barbara Barsky,' and there might be a stampede towards the box office."

But when that moment comes, anyone who has ever seen her perform will know not to budge from their seat. Because like a fireman when she hits that pole, it will be as if she's been playing Norma Desmond all her life.

An Opera About Emma Goldman: Red Emma, an opera by composer Gary Kulesha and librettist Carol Bolt, is set to premiere Nov. 28 at the du Maurier Theatre Centre at Toronto's Harbourfront. Based on Bolt's 1974 play of the same name, the opera tells the story of the Jewish anarchist Emma Goldman (1869-1940), tracing her development from a naive young idealist to a powerful social reformer in both the United States and Canada. (Goldman took sick and died while visiting Toronto; she had been staying at a house on Vaughan Road.)

Bolt recalled that she was inspired to write the play "after reading Goldman's autobiography, which is full of grand adventure and passion. She was in love with love, with ideas and with political change. To me, it's a wonderful thing that a young woman in her early 20s could be so committed to the cause of changing the world. This is what attracted me to her."

Performances are Nov. 28 & 29 and Dec. 1, 2 & 3. Tickets are $40 and $25. 416-973-4000.

Philip Glass in Performance: La Belle et la Bête, which the Philip Glass Ensemble is set to perform at Roy Thomson Hall Nov. 27 at 8 p.m., is categorically unlike Disney's or any other version of the much-beloved Beauty and the Beast story. This bold work combines a lush, melodic new opera and Jean Cocteau's classic 1946 film of the same name, which is screened onstage behind the musicians. The result, according to the New York Times, is "nothing less than a new form of musical theatre."

After the opera received its U.S. premiere in Brooklyn last December, American critics seemed just as enthralled as their European counterparts had been during a previous 40-city tour across Europe.

Born to a Jewish family in Baltimore in 1937, Glass was driving taxis in New York City as late as 1978, while feverishly composing a range of esoteric works in his spare time. Even before he had given up his day-job, he had gained an international reputation as a champion of minimalism and the avant-garde. With La Belle et la Bête, he ventures into a realm of dreamy, almost surreal romanticism.

Jean Cocteau, the celebrated French avant-garde poet, novelist and artist (1889-1963), based his film on a story written about 1740. Released immediately after the devastation of World War II, it astonished critics by entirely abandoning the stage set of the modern world, with all of its ugly realism, for a fanciful allegorical world of magic, surrealism and happy endings. Perhaps the film's most enduring element is its vivid imagery: the animated candelabras, the magic mirrors that reveal secrets, the stone-faced statues with big, watching eyes.

La Belle et la Bête contains classic elements of fairy tales and plots from the Arabian Nights to Cinderella to King Lear. It is a simple allegorical tale proclaiming the supremacy of inner spiritual beauty over outward physical appearance. 416-872-4255.

David Broza; Dark Ages Romance; Memoirs of a River

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB News Editor

TORONTO – David Broza: Called a post-modern Leonard Cohen by one critic, Israeli superstar David Broza – who has played with the likes of Sting and Bob Dylan– brings his dynamic live show to Lee's Palace on Nov. 29.

Broza, who has two albums just released in Canada, is a passionate singer who blends his music with works of poetry, troubadour-style. Broza has one triple platinum album and five gold albums in Israel.

The play is an excellent commentary on male-female and interracial relationships with a wry twist at the end. Gallander, whose previous plays include Curator's Park and Pseudopod Rejects , was a co-founder and producer of the SummerWorks Theatre Festival. It is produced by Ben Stadelmann.

The play begins at 8 p.m. with a matinee performance on Sunday. For information, call 538-0988.

Memoirs of a River: On Nov. 26, the Toronto Jewish Film Society presents Judit Elek's film Memoirs of a River. This subtitled Hungarian drama tells the story of four Jewish men accused of ritual murder in the 19th century.

The screening is at the Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall, 317 Dundas St. W. at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are on sale 15 minutes in advance. The film will also be screened Nov. 28 at 6:30 p.m.

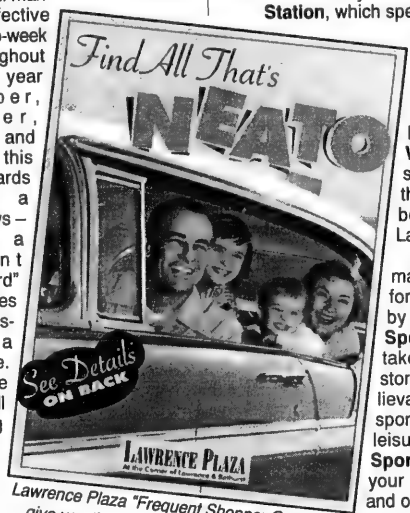
Lawrence Plaza rewards frequent shoppers

The spirit of the '50's is alive and well and living at Lawrence Plaza — an entirely fitting state of affairs for this friendly neighbourhood plaza that in 1954, anchored by Morgan's department store, became Canada's first shopping centre and changed forever the way we shop.

If you're one of the many people who've shopped there since day one or were taken there for a bagel or a nosh by your parents or grandparents — which should include just about everybody — you'll appreciate the Frequent Shopper Program introduced this fall by mall management. Effective during four two-week periods throughout the year (September, November, January, and March), this program rewards shoppers in a variety of ways – using a "Frequent Shopper card" featuring 'fifties scenes reminiscent of a simpler time. The cards are available at all participating retailers, onsite greeters and/or in your mail box Monday Nov. 20. We can't go back to the 'fifties, but, says property manager Sandy Pelletier-Severn, "hopefully our Frequent Shopper Program will give our customers the same warm fuzzy feeling."



Lawrence Plaza "Frequent Shopper Cards" will give you that warm fuzzy 'fifties feeling . . .

First, merely by being at the plaza Nov. 20 to Dec. 2 with your Frequent Shopper Card, you become eligible to win one of sixty prizes awarded at random. Second, with total purchases of $60 or more during this period, you become eligible for the Grand Prize to be awarded Dec. 4 (dinner for two at Senator on the Square and tickets for two to Sunset Boulevard). A $500 shopping spree will also be given away as a year-end Grand Prize in March.

. . . and back it up with fun, prizes and fabulous savings Nov. 20 to Dec. 2

Merchants will stamp your card with every $20 purchased.

Third, you can look forward to wonderful values the like of which are not to be found elsewhere. The 1995 version of Lawrence Plaza is a mix of some fabulous "golden oldies" like United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, Kleinberg Jewellery, Roland and Romaine Dance School (where the who's who have trained) and the Regal Bridge Club (where the who's who have played and still do), and some exciting new "concept" stores like Prime Time Video, which offers high-tech entertainment in a variety of formats, and Toy Station, which specializes in educational toys. For clothing, of course, there's a host of choices headlined by Winners; smart shoppers know they can get the best for less at Lawrence Plaza.

Anchoring the mall in the space formerly occupied by The Bay, Sportmart has taken Toronto by storm with its unbelievable selection of sporting goods and leisure wear. Sportmart has all your skiing, skating and other winter sport needs at the best prices in town.

The ever-popular Bath 'N Bedtime, recently doubled in size, now offers you an even greater selection of sheets, towels, and other bed and bath accessories. Phantom Hosiery – Shoppers Drug Mart – Buckstop/Shoprite – Camp Connection – Cotton Ginny – everything you need every day is available at Lawrence Plaza, and always at the lowest possible prices. You can count on it and take it to the bank (CIBC, Bank of Nova Scotia and Canada Trust right on the premises).

Lawrence Plaza has an ample parking lot, and many of its loyal, longtime customers still enjoy walking to the mall from their nearby homes. "It has that friendly neighbourhood feeling," says one, "that other malls just can't duplicate. I feel I can be myself here, and find what I need at my leisure. And the prices are unbeatable."

'Fifties, anyone?

Singles Registry unveils new computer system

It was 2 years in the making but the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto has recently unveiled its new computer system. Phase 1 was recently put into service a few weeks ago with astonishing results. The system handles all J.S.R. members selections, decisions and responses within seconds. "It is absolutely incredible" states J.S.R.'s director Rob Singer. "We grew so fast, so soon, that we were always behind in our paperwork. Now, within a month we are completely up to date and can easily handle 10 times our current membership".

Members Benefit

The new computer system's net benefit to J.S.R. members is tremendous, providing them with faster connections, increased response time, and more personalized service. New membership drives are already in progress to take advantage of the Registry's increased capacity.

2 More Engagements Announced

Mazel Tov is in the air again as 2 more J.S.R. couples will be walking down the aisle in just a short while. This brings the total of couples that are either married or engaged through the service to 11, including 7 couples so far in 1995 alone. If you are looking to meet other Jewish singles, be it for friendship, dating or even marriage there is no better place to register with, than the Jewish Singles Registry.

Happy Anniversary

With 11 marriages, engagements and dozens of romances underway the J.S.R. is happily celebrating its 3rd anniversary in Toronto. With close to 1,000 members and steadily growing J.S.R. is now the largest Jewish dating service in the city. With new registrants signing up daily, members are provided with more and more singles to choose from. Word of mouth advertising still ranks high as one of the Registry's main sources of new registrants, a positive sign that J.S.R. members are satisfied with the service.

Always on The Job

A lot of dating services have come and gone recently. Most of them operate as a "part-time" business, and generally do not make it past the 1st year. J.S.R. on the other hand, is a dynamic and expanding community-based service, with a "full-time" director. With offices in Toronto, Montreal, and Ottrawa, the selection of compatable members has never been better, and long office hours, ensures that members can take advantage of the Registry 6 days a week including evenings and weekends.

In just 3 short years J.S.R. has literally taken the Toronto Jewish dating scene by storm. Exciting changes are underway to propel J.S.R. even further ahead in the near future. With membership skyrocketing the time is right to register and become part of this outstanding network of Jewish singles.

Contacting the J.S.R. has never been easier. It is as simple as picking up your phone and calling them right now. If you don't reach them in person on your first try, don't worry ... as their 24-hr. a day answering system will accept messages on your behalf. The phone number is 416-398-7068.

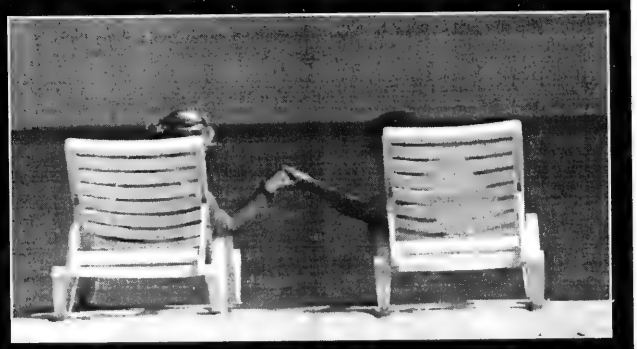
One Plus One



is fun

Unlike any other dating service, The Registry offers an unlimited number of introductions that you alone select from our extensive bio/photo library.

Call today, because if you're looking for the "right one," The Jewish Singles Registry is it.

CN TOWER TORONTO ONTARIO

Where better to say "L'Chaim" than . . . L'Chaim?

Spurred by the success of his two-year-old Crystal Restaurant at 2901 Steeles Avenue West, owner Avi Revah recently bought out the former Baba Ganoov Restaurant at 404 Steeles Avenue West (across from Jumbo Video) and gave it a new name: "L'Chaim."

True to its name, he says, L'Chaim is "a welcoming place where the entire family can come and enjoy great food in a true Jewish/Israeli atmosphere." To back up this claim, he has introduced a Friday night "kabalat shabbat" dinner that will give you all the pleasures of a home-cooked sabbath dinner without the time and energy required to prepare it. The meal includes soup, salad, and your choice of grilled chicken breast, turkey shishlik or fish of the day, plus coffee or tea, for only $18 (chai dollars). As a further enticement, children aged 12 and under can enjoy this dinner at half price.

Shabbat dinner

The regular menu (lunch and dinner are served daily) features a variety of Middle Eastern and continental dishes including shish kebab, steak, grilled and B.B.Q. chicken, roast beef, as well as all your favourite Middle Eastern appetizers like hummous, eggplant salad, tabooli salad, Moroccan cigars, majadara, and a cavalcade of fresh salads. Pasta and bruschetta are also available.

Crystal Restaurant, already well-known for its fabulous simchas, features a similar menu. With a banquet hall that seats up to 300 people, it has allowed many customers to "crystallize" their visions of a large-scale bar mitzvah or birthday party at what Revah terms "very reasonable prices." And people are still talking about the New Year's bash that Revah threw at Crystal last year; people wishing to order tickets for this year's gala are advised to do so early, as last year's was a sellout. (A New Year's celebration is also planned for L'Chaim).

On weekends, Crystal features lives entertainment with top name Israeli singers. For your simchas, Crystal will make available at no extra charge their experienced DJ, whose large repertoire includes hits from the 50s and 60s. Crystal also plans to feature singles and couples nights in the near future.

Both L'Chaim and Crystal are immaculate, a fact of which Revah is particularly proud. "Cleanliness is next to G-dliness." he says. He also promises that guests at either establishment will be received with "dignity, warmth and respect." And you'll love the quality, he says, as well as the size of the portions. "Our customers can expect to get their money's worth and more," he says. "We will make you happy. When you say "L'Chaim," we'll know we've done our job."

Dear Ella,

I'm young and single and I like to live for today. I blow my entire pay cheque every week on clothes, holidays and having fun.

My parents tell me I should set aside more money for a rainy day. I know that makes sense, but every time I manage to save a bit of money I find something I just have to have. Now I know what they mean by money burning a hole in your pocket.

Out of Control

Dear Out of Control,

Talk about burning a hole in your pocket, I'm the original forest fire!

First let me say, a leopard doesn't change its spots. You are what you are. Work with it. Here is what I do to cool those flames a bit.

Out of every pay cheque, have your employer or the bank deduct money directly into an RRSP. It is a psychological thing, but believe me, if you don't see the money from the very beginning, it is as though it doesn't exist. The first couple of pay cheques, it is hard to make the adjustment but after that it's smooth sailing. Take your pay and spend spend spend. There will be a little nest egg left in spite of yourself.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counselor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems,

PUBLIC NOTICE

GRANT MACKENZIES

located at Yorkville North, 100 Steeles Avenue West, is

BANKRUPT

Dear Valued Grant Mackenzies Customer:

As you probably know, the continuing recession, especially in the menswear business, has been unrelenting.

After 4 years of providing you with the best fashion, quality, price and service available in men's retail, Grant Mackenzies is forced to declare bankruptcy and close its doors forever.

Our store is filled to the brim with new fall merchandise which we have no choice but to liquidate at ridiculously low prices.

A. Farber Associates, Trustee in Bankruptcy, has been appointed to wind down Grant Mackenzies, and has engaged a specialist in high quality menswear liquidation to administer our bankruptcy sale.

As a courtesy to our loyal customers, we have set aside Thursday November 23, from 12:00 noon to 10:00 p.m., to give you the widest choice before the sale opens to the public on Friday November 24 at 10:00 a.m.

My staff and I thank you for your support and friendship over the years.

Sincerely,

Meyer Katz

'Big M' opens rink in Metulla

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Skating with the likes of Gerald Halbert, Steve Ain and Mel Wolfond, it's unlikely Frank Mahovlich experienced deja vu or the feeling he was back on the ice in the old glory days with Dave Keon, Gordie Howe or Jean Beliveau.

Nevertheless the "Big M" returned from Israel recently with fond memories of skating on the new Olympic-sized hockey rink in Metulla.

Wearing his Montreal Canadiens sweater, Mahovlich joined significant contributors to the United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada and UIA officials for a five-minute game of shinny against hockey players from Metulla.

The "game" was part of the hoopla associated with the opening of the William and Dorothy Drevnig Ice Arena and the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation Galleria at the newly expanded Canada Centre. The centre is the largest UIA Canada project in Israel, providing residents of Israel's north with a wide range of recreation facilities.

"It's a beautiful building, just gorgeous," said Mahovlich, who brought along a plaque provided by the National Hockey League to mark the opening of the new rink.

"I was proud to be part of [the opening ceremonies]," Mahovlich said. "I told them the same thing happened to me while living in Schumacher, Ont. [near Timmins] when J.P. Bickell opened a rink."

The Hall of Famer said it was in that northern Ontario rink that he developed the skills that made him an all-star in an outstanding NHL career in Toronto, Detroit and Montreal.

"We've got a great game. The more people who learn to skate, play and enjoy it, the better for everybody," he said.

For Mahovlich and his wife Marie, who said Metulla reminded her of Lake Placid, N.Y., the visit to Canada Centre was only part of a 10-day tour that included stops at many significant Christian holy sites.

"I was brought up as a Catholic so it was amazing to me to see where the miracles took place," he said.

Israel rocked by conspiracy rumors

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — The disclosure that the head of an extreme right-wing fringe group was a paid informer of the General Security Service (GSS) has cast a dark shadow on Israel's intelligence organization and fueled rumors of a conspiracy.

The revelation that Avishai Raviv, a close friend of murderer Yigal Amir and leader of the right-wing movement Eyal, was employed by the GSS was another major blow to the prestige and credibility of the secret service.

If Raviv was being paid to provide the GSS with information on dangerous elements in the extreme right, how could he have failed to warn his employers about Amir? Was he a double agent? Did extreme right activists suspect he was a mole?

These are just a few of the questions raised by the affair, which rocked the country when it was first revealed on Israel Television last week.

Many right-wing figures saw more than incompetence in the actions of the security service. Rabbi Benny Alon, an outspoken critic of the peace process, charged that the GSS had been used "as a tool of the government to discredit the right. The organization Eyal was synonymous with Avishai Raviv. If he was indeed a GSS agent, the unavoidable conclusion is that Eyal was established and operated by the GSS." said Rabbi Alon, now a member of the right-wing Moledat party.

The Kiryat Arba local council blamed the security service for

New CJFC Board

TORONTO — At its national board meeting here earlier this year, the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada (CJFC) chose a new president and slate of officers for the coming two-year term.

The executive, headed by Montreal's Richard Vineberg as president, includes Harvey Wolfe, vice-president, CJF-CJFC relations; Ted Zacks, vice-president, budget and allocations; Marilyn Blumer, vice-president, community services; and Sheila Engel, vice-president, planning and priorities.

Prof. Irving Abella has been appointed chair of CJF Canada's National Commission on Identity and Continuity.

The CJFC is affiliated with the Council of Jewish Federations, which serves and represents 180 Jewish federations throughout North America.

Na'amat Canada to Israel

MONTREAL — Na'amat Canada has announced that its 1996 convention will be held in Israel, where members will also take part in Jerusalem 3000 festivities.

The trip will take place in October.

Highlights of the combined convention/mission will be tours of major historic sites and meetings with high-level Israeli political leaders.

A key component, the group says, will be a Leadership Development Seminar for those aged 25 to 45.

The trip is open to members and non-members but spaces must be reserved. Contact national executive director Vivian Reisler by May 15 at 514-488-0797.

ISRAEL

Leah Rabin to Meet Pope

JERUSALEM — Leah Rabin will reportedly have an audience with Pope John Paul II at the Vatican next month.

The pontiff requested the meeting after learning that the widow of slain Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin planned to attend a memorial service for her late husband in Rome, Israel Radio reported.

New Peace Poll

JERUSALEM — A poll of 400 adults taken after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin shows support for the peace process jumped sharply to 73 per cent, from 55 per cent in October, while support for the Oslo peace accords rose to 58 per cent from 47 per cent, the director of Tel Aviv University's Tamar Steinmetz Center for Peace Research announced last Wednesday.

The poll also shows that 40 per cent of the haredi community approves of non-violent, illegal demonstrations, while nearly 24 per cent supports violent, illegal actions.

Levinger's Wife Sentenced

JERUSALEM — Miriam Levinger, wife of extremist Hebron settlement founder Rabbi Moshe Levinger, was sentenced last week to 10 days in prison for contempt of court.

During a court hearing last Monday, Miriam Levinger denounced the government and police, and refused to stand before the judge.

She has repeatedly refused to appear in court for hearings on allegations that she hit a police officer.

Gunman Killed

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Jordanian security forces last Tuesday coordinated the hunt for a gunman who opened fire on an IDF patrol in the Beit She'an Valley, lightly wounding an Israeli soldier.

Following a four-hour search, the gunman was shot dead after he pointed a firearm at Israeli soldiers, who found him hiding near the site of the first shooting.

Social Spending

JERUSALEM — More than half of Israel's budget — 53 per cent — is spent on social programs, according to a report compiled by the Institute for Research of Social Policy in Israel.

The report shows that the Labor government's spending on social programs for the elderly, disabled and the unemployed exceeded that by the former Likud govenment.

The amount allocated this year for social welfare reached $17 billion (US), more than for defence, new roads and IDF redeployment in the territories, the report shows.

JERUSALEM — A pocket-sized photo album, containing rare snapshots from the Lublin Ghetto, has been received at Yad Vashem.

Researchers believe the pictures were taken by a Wehrmacht soldier who sent them to his girlfriend back home.

Yad Vashem says the pictures of life and death in the Lublin Ghetto are unique.

Canadians Attend

NEW YORK — Hundreds gathered here recently for the dedication of the Women's League Seminary Synagogue, located at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Over the past few years, the Women's League for Conservative Judaism has underwritten renovations to the sanctuary, including a custom-designed Aron Kodesh, new Torah mantles and a parokhet.

Canadians attending the dedication ceremony were Leona Eligberg, Shirley Rapoport, Ethel Phillips and Carol Sher from Montreal, and Margo Grosbein and Terry Winston from Toronto.

Canadians Honored

NEW YORK — Israel's renowned Ponevez Yeshiva recently presented its Founder's Award to Isadore Black and his wife Belle, of Peterborough, Ont.

The Blacks were honored at a Nov. 19 dinner here given by the American Friends of Ponevez Yeshiva in Israel.

Isadore Black's father, Rabbi Pesach Black, studied under the father of the yeshivah's founder, Rabbi Yosef Kahaneman.

Rabbi Pesach Black immigrated to Peterborough in 1908 and founded a men's clothing outlet bearing the family name.

The Blacks have maintained strong ties with both the yeshivah's Ashdod and Bnei Brak campuses.

Nazi Imprisoned

BONN — A well-known German neo-Nazi last week began a two-year jail sentence for inciting racial hatred, and he faces more charges in connection with a book he co-published.

Gunter Deckert was arrested this month on charges that the book, The Case of Gunter Deckert contains anti-Semitic remarks.

The book describes his trial for denying the Holocaust occurred, for which he received the jail term.

Neo-Nazis on Trial

BUDAPEST — Hungary's leading neo-Nazi went on trial here this month on charges of inciting racial hatred.

Albert Szabo and six of his followers are being tried for wearing Nazi uniforms and for displaying Nazi flags and other symbols at public demonstrations.

But he is not being charged with organizing anti-Semitic demonstrations, because such gatherings are not illegal under Hungarian law.

Torah can never condone killing: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Torah forbids Jews to take a life, even if we think G-d has commanded us to do so, affirms Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, noted lecturer, writer, rosh yeshivah, chief rabbi of Efrat, and a spokesperson for centrist Orthodoxy.

Referring to the murderer of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, he said that when we use the name of G-d for such false purposes, the world shakes, because it leaves no room for repentence.

Rabbi Riskin was speaking at B'nai Torah Congregation to an eerily silent audience that filled both floors of the sanctuary and the social hall, where his speech was seen and heard over closed-circuit monitors.

The rabbi condemned those who see Halachah in "absolute" terms, who reach the conclusion "I have the absolute value, and if you think differently then I can kill you."

"The same force of idealism that when properly utilized enables society to reach the highest ideals can lead to fanatacism, allowing people to destroy others. And that's wrong."

Any philosophy "that justifies taking the life of a leader of Israel is a perversion of Torah and must be seen as such," he said.

Noting that he had had well-publicized differences of opinion with Rabin, "I respected him greatly as a hero and leader, as the architect of the Entebbe rescue.

"The trauma of his assassination by the hand of a Jew left a deep and black cloud over many of us in Israel and around the world."

Speaking, he said, as much to himself as to the audience, he insisted that yeshivot must teach their students that "the path of peace is the highest purpose of Torah. We must say and teach that over and over. Only then are we teaching G-d's Torah and not a perversion of it."

He said he does not trust the peace process of Rabin, current Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat, but nevertheless, if the majority of Israelis felt that it was necessary, for the sake of peace, to abandon Efrat, he would agree.

Shalom, peace, is critical, he said, but both sides have to realize that and compromise. "The right has to say we'll give up on [the concept of] Greater Israel and the left has to respect the rights and homes of those citizens who are settlers. They must be protected."

In response to a question from the audience, Rabbi Riskin admitted that there is considerable hostility against the religious in Israel, and not just because of the assassination.

Part of it comes from "jealousy. At one time, most of the army leadership was from the kibbutz. Now, 40 per cent of the top units and officers are kippah srugah (literally, those who wear the knitted yarmulkahs that are the symbol of the centrist Orthodox), even if they are only 20 per cent of the population."

The religious, however, have not reached out enough to the rest of the country. Speaking to The CJN after the lecture, Rabbi Riskin said, "The religious parties have to stop worrying about legislating. We have to realize that the way to influence is through love, loving-kindness and openness."

While he said he disagreed with recent statements by settler spokespersons that the assassination has effectively destroyed the integrity and effectiveness of the settler movement, he said he believed that it "set it back a good deal.

"Ironically, Rabin was one person who seemed concerned about the settlements."

On being told that Peres, in his recent speech to the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, promised that the settlements would be maintained, he commented wryly, "If they are maintained under Palestinian sovereignty, that is no help."

Asked about statements by different rabbis in the anti-peace process camp that they felt shame and a sense of blame about what happened, he said, "Those who condoned in any shape disrespect, or didn't emphasize sufficiently the value of reverence for life, should feel a sense of shame."

The evening began with a moment of silence in memory of Rabin, and the singing of K'El Maleh Rachamim by Mizrachi of Canada executive director Rabbi Menachem Gopin.

In an unusually impassioned speech, World Mizrachi chair Kurt Rothschild said, "The bullet was a mortal attack not just on Rabin, but on the Torah community ... that can in no way be justified.

"Anyone who does [justify it], let it be stated that we and our religious teachers utterly reject them."

Zundel facing complaint

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron is treading over the familiar ground of a decade ago as she has again laid a private criminal complaint against Nazi apologist Ernst Zundel.

In the early 1980s, refusal of the Ontario attorney general to charge Zundel with wilful promotion of hatred against Jews prompted Citron to charge the neo-Nazi publisher with publishing "false news" denying the Holocaust.

This time she is alleging that Zundel conspired to promote hatred against Jews. The complaint also alleges Zundel published criminal libels.

Under Canada's anti-hate law, the consent of the attorney general is needed to launch a prosecution. But the information laid by Citron alleges Zundel conspired to promote hatred in Germany. The law comes into effect when the offence — promotion of hatred — is a crime in both Canada and a second country. And because the charges are not for promotion of hatred per se, the consent of the attorney general may not be required, Citron explained.

A hearing on the case will be held on Dec. 19 before a justice of the peace.

From the editor's desk

Downcast and at a loss as a result of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's murder on Nov. 4, many of us are still deeply agitated, pitching and tossing in a sea of national self-doubt. Until our way is once again smoothed and settled by the anchors of our communal stability, we seek the inspiration and lift from the crest of even one small wave of goodness.

The column which was promised one month ago about the Canadian activist "whose story too is a tribute to activism, involvement, and the moral power of solidarity in a just cause" may provide part of that lift, for it tells of a goodness which has been shared and felt throughout the Jewish world.

Joel Sussman is a member of a musical group called Safam. Their music is a creative, inspiring, vibrant, joyful and at times tearful excursion through the experience of being a Jew. Whether it is a traditional prayer from the siddur set to a new, evocative tune or a thoughtful poem set to passionate harmonies, their style is original and their music is a sensory tour de force and a lyric chronicle of the modern Jewish condition. For example, World of our Fathers tells of the eastern European immigrant's experiences at the turn of the century. Falasha Nevermore describes the Ethiopians' return to Israel. Maranno is a tale of a hidden past which is reawakened by a modern love. Nachamu Ami is a stirring rendition of the prophet's call. The list is indeed quite long. They are now working on their ninth album.

Part of an original core of four, Sussman co-founded the group more than 20 years ago in Boston, where he has been living since 1972. But he is originally from Edmonton.

He was a ba'al kriyah at the age of 12, the founder of Edmonton USY at 16 and the president of Hillel at the University of Alberta at the age of 20. But all the paths of his youth led him inexorably to Israel. And at 21, he volunteered in a special program of the Jewish Agency. What had to that point in his life been only stirrings and curiosities, crystallized in the air and dreamy exhilaration of Israel to form in the deepest part of his soul, a sweet and generous Jewish poet and song-writer. He married a Bostonian and eventually settled there.

In the late '70s, a song written and performed by Safam became the signature piece for the Soviet Jewry movement across North America. It begins as a solitary lament, continues in the second stanza as a resolute declaration, then culminates defiantly as an uplifting rallying cry. I reproduce part of it.

Leaving Mother Russia

They call me Anatole
In prison I do lie
My little window looks out
On a Russian sky.
I've been arrested here
For crimes they have not named
But all my people know
The charges are a frame.
See my accuser standing in the hall.
He points a finger at us all.
You now must pay the penalty
For the crime of daring to be free

We are leaving Mother Russia
We have waited far too long
We are leaving Mother Russia
When they come for us,
we'll be gone.

...These ancient prison walls
Have watched them all pass by,
And many of them
Were much stronger men than I.
For they lived without hope
Alone inside their cell,
But I've a vision of my home in Yisrael.
My friends we know
what silence brings,
Another Hitler waiting in the wings,
So stand up now and shout it to the sky,
They may bring us to our knees but we'll never die!

We are leaving Mother Russia....

When Joel received the sad news of his father's severe illness, he literally raced across the continent to be at his side, to be able one final time to take his father's hand into his own. Then he wrote Tribute.

Oh, the man was not a saint
Because no mortal man could be.
But the man, he was the kind
I've tried so very hard to be.
For he said it does not matter
What you earn or where you live,
For a man, he is remembered
By the way that he would give.

And the man, he was a giver,
And he gave with all his heart
But it pained him so to take
Because he loved the giving part.

So I give to you my father dear
In sad memoriam,
That this man, he is a better man
For knowing he's your son.

Tribute interweaves the son's last farewell with the words of the Kaddish. And thus in this one elegiac tune, we hear Joel's musical genius and his musical purpose. For he joins the aching melancholy of personal loss to the beautiful, reaffirming harmony of our tradition.

Sussman's goodness and Safam's music are indeed a wave of inspiration whose crest we can ride, even if for a moment, to find our way back through the sea of doubt. - MBD

Chanukah concert set

TORONTO — Singer, composer and recording artist Paul Zim, who has been dubbed "The Jewish Music Man," will perform in a special Chanukah concert on Dec. 10, at 10:30 a.m. at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Sponsored by the synagogue's Young Families Group, Zim, who has recorded some two dozen CDs and tapes that have become popular worldwide, will perform with the Spinning Dreidel Band and the Beth Emeth Children's Choir.

For Chanukah, Zim has written a spirited sing-along song, The Chanukah Party, and another, The Paul Zim Chanukah Miracle.

Zim, who is the cantor at the Conservative Hillcrest Jewish Centre in Queens, N.Y., was born on Euclid Avenue in Toronto. His father and grandfather were cantors in Warsaw.

Former Jerusalem mayor spurns Palestinian claims

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel should categorically reject Palestinian claims to East Jerusalem at formal talks on the city's political future scheduled to begin in May 1996, says Teddy Kollek, the former mayor of Jerusalem.

"The Palestinian demands will be very great, but we'll have to say no." Defiantly, he added: "Let them go to Nablus or any other place."

Kollek, mayor from 1967 to 1993, unequivocably spurns the Palestinian claim to East Jerusalem, which Israel annexed in the wake of the 1967 Six Day War. The demand is historically "unjustified" and, secondly, practically untenable.

"Palestinian nationalism is young and exuberant and it is a reality you cannot deny," he said in an interview on the eve of receiving an honorary Doctor of Laws degree from the University of Toronto. "So I accept the fact that Palestinian nationalism exists.

"We'll have to pay the price for peace and give up a certain amount of land. But we shall not let Jerusalem be divided again. We shan't go back to the period before 1967."

Furthermore, Kollek stated, Israel should maintain possession of the Gush Etzion bloc, near Jerusalem, and retain Maaleh Adumim, the largest settlement in the West Bank and in practice a suburb of Jerusalem.

Kollek, a member of the ruling Labor party, said he doubts whether a hard-line position on Jerusalem will jeopardize Israel's negotiations with the PLO when the two sides meet to thrash out the matter in approximately six months from now.

In a related comment, Kollek poured cold water on a recent suggestion by Yossi Beilin — the former deputy foreign minister and now minister of planning and economics — that Palestinians should be granted autonomy in Arab neighborhoods of Jerusalem.

Kollek believes that the borough system, his solution, has a better chance of working and of being accepted by Israelis.

Under his plan, Jerusalem would remain Israel's undivided capital and its Arab inhabitants would be allowed to elect Palestinian municipal officials and to exert partial control over budgets.

Turning to another topic, Kollek — a secular Jew — expressed fear that the continued growth of Jerusalem's anti-Zionist, ultra-Orthodox Jewish population will ultimately change the character of Israel's capital and present Israel with a monumental problem.

"If there'll be a considerable majority of haredim — ultra-Orthodox Jews — who are against the secular government, I do not know how a secular government will function in Jerusalem," he warned.

"It could be very difficult to run the city under these circumstances."

At present, about a third of Jerusalem's Jewish populace is composed of haredim, who control key city council committees on planning, social services and education.

By all accounts, haredi voters helped Jerusalem's current mayor, Ehud Olmert, to unseat Kollek in the 1993 municipal election.

Kollek criticized a decision by Israel last spring, since suspended, to confiscate 134 acres in Beit Safafa and Beit Hanina, close to Jerusalem.

"It was an error to announce this expropriation. You shouldn't expropriate land unless it is absolutely necessary."

He justified land seizures during his administration to make way for new Jewish residential neighborhoods in French Hill, Gilo and Neve Yacov.

"What we expropriated was state land or even Jewish land. Beit Safafa and Beit Hanina, on the other hand, are on private Arab land."

Looking back, Kollek voiced regret that he had not met Arab housing demands during his tenure.

"Arabs in Jerusalem, on the whole, are better off than Arabs in other cities. But on a government level, we should have done more.

Although he was loath to criticize his successor — "it would sound like sour grapes" — Kollek took Olmert to task for what he claimed is an excessive concentration on "non-practical issues."

Asked to explain, Kollek elaborated: "Statements like Jerusalem is the eternal, indivisible capital of Israel' create the necessity of an Arab response. I've never heard [Prime Minister Shimon] Peres say that."

In closing, Kollek described his greatest achievement as the greening of Jerusalem with parks and trees. Conversely, he is sorry that he failed to attract hi-tech industry to the city.

Kollek, who was also in Toronto on behalf of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, a fundraising body, reported that he is in good health, despite a recent fall which caused a hairline knee fracture and forces him to use a cane.

Branson closer to closing

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite appeals from Jewish groups and others, the Metro Toronto District Health Council (MTDHC) has voted to close Branson Hospital and merge it with York Finch Hospital, seven kilometres away. The MTDHC recommendation now goes to the Ontario government.

The only change the MTDHC made from its original report proposal to close 12 hospitals is to exempt Western Hospital on Bathurst Street, because it would cost $45 million, not $8 million, to merge it with the General branch of Toronto Hospital.

"I'm stunned, they [MTHDC] didn't pay any attention to our argument that merging us with York Finch will not save any money," Jack Gallop, president of Branson Hospital, told The CJN.

"We will fight on," he said.

Attorney General Charles Harnick, whose provincial Willowdale riding houses many Branson users, told a meeting recently that the MTDHC report is only a recommendation. He said he is supporting his constituents in their fight to keep Branson open and is cooperating with Monte Kwinter, the Liberal member in whose riding of Wilson Heights the hospital is located.

Gallop attended the MTDHC meeting which reaffirmed the decision to close Branson. "The group which dealt with community hospitals spent only about 15 minutes discussing Branson. They didn't consider our financial arguments at all. Their attitude was that the elderly people who now come to Branson should go to North York General, Sunnybrook or York Central."

The Branson president pointed out that two floors of the hospital's east wing, newly converted to use for elderly patients with money raised in the local community, will sit empty if the MTDHC report is approved.

4 groups join Nemsila case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Four Canadian Jewish groups were granted intervenor status last week in the case of alleged Nazi war criminal Josef Nemsila.

Canadian Jewish Congress, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, B'nai Brith Canada and the Coalition of Concerned Congregations (a Montreal organization) were given the right to present legal arguments before Federal Court Associate Chief Justice James Jerome.

Beginning on Nov. 28, Jerome will hear an appeal by federal lawyers of a decision by Immigration adjudicator Ed McNamara that threw out deportation proceedings against Nemsila.

McNamara ruled that even though Nemsila may have lied to Immigration authorities about his Nazi past, his Canadian domicile prevented him from being deported.

Josef Nemsila

The Jewish groups will be able to present legal arguments on the question of domicile, said Congress spokesperson Steven Shulman.

Justice and Immigration Department authorities had sought to deport Nemsila for lying about his wartime activities. They allege he was a member of the Hlinka Guard, the Slovak equivalent of the German SS.

In other developments, Jerome will hear an application for disclosure of documents by lawyers for three other alleged war criminals on Dec. 12, Shulman said.

The lawyers have urged the court to grant a stay of proceedings based on the argument that the cases against their clients should have been launched under the criminal law and not under civil proceedings.

Federal authorities are hoping to strip the three of their citizenship and deport them — a procedure that was successfully employed against Dutch Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens.

Israeli ceramics on display

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An exhibition of more than 100 works by 31 of Israel's finest ceramic artists, titled Ceramics Israel, will be held at the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery at 25 Caroline St. North of Waterloo, Ont. from Dec. 7 through Feb. 25, 1996, in cooperation with the Consul General of Israel, Toronto.

The opening session, to be hosted by Pamela and Donald Bierstock, will also launch a chair in Jewish studies at the University of Waterloo.

The exhibition was organized by The Clay Studio (Philadelphia) and mounted in cooperation with the Ceramic Artists Association of Israel and the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It was curated by Jimmy Clark.

Officially opened in 1993, the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery provides a place where contemporary work by national and international clay and glass artists can be exhibited, studied, documented and collected.

Ceramic art of Israel is a reflection of the country itself. The exhibition was designed to show off the state of modern Israeli ceramic art, while reflecting ancient cultures. Israeli ceramic artists do not use heavy glazes; instead they emphasize the natural coloration and textures of sand, which is a component of their ceramics material.

For more information, call the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery, 519-746-1882 or fax 519-746-6396.

As a prosecutor with the U.S. Justice Department's Nazi War Crimes Unit, John Loftus discovered top secret documents revealing that the Nazis he had been assigned to prosecute were working for NATO Intelligence. He exposed the shocking Nazi scandal on an Emmy Award winning segment of 60 Minutes. His newest book exposes the still classified archives of the Holocaust, how Jews have been systematically wire tapped since 1944 and how Israel was set up in the Iran-Contra Affair by George Bush.

After doing an enormous amount of research, Loftus has become one of the most learned, sensational and dynamic speakers exposing Western espionage against U.S. Jews and Israel.

Governing...in Ontario

This editorial is being written before the government of Ontario announced its second round of spending cuts this week. The first round of cuts was imposed in July, barely weeks after the government was elected. People have speculated that the treasurer will reduce the deficit by a further $3.5 billion. With a reduction of such magnitude, everyone in the province will be affected.

Some analysts observe that the Harris government is not merely trying to restructure the province's finances, but rather is attempting to restructure Ontario society. As the Globe and Mail reported last week, government officials "talk about a cultural and attitudinal change about how services will be delivered. And they freely confess that the Common Sense Revolution ... will take the province into uncharted waters."

Sailing into uncharted waters is not a pleasant prospect for us to contemplate. But, assuming it is genuinely unavoidable, it is important that it be undertaken skillfully, sensitively, thoughtfully. If indeed the government is attempting a sea change regarding the extent of its involvement in the life of the community, it must put forward to the public a statement of its operating principles. It is not enough simply to say, cavalierly, we are acting according to common sense, that we can no longer do what we cannot afford. Rather we must say that we will find ways to afford what needs to be done.

Especially in uncharted waters, it is the task of the ship of state to help its citizens survive the unsteady voyage, not cast them aside.

... in Quebec

Lucien Bouchard announced last week that he would seek the leadership of the Parti Quebecois and with it, the premiership of the province. He also announced that he would never sit down at the negotiating table with the rest of Canada to discuss renewed federalism. The only constitutional conversation he will hold with Canada, he vowed, will be to negotiate the terms of separation.

He thus ensures, for the duration of his tenure as leader, unsettled, turbulent relations with Ottawa and with the other provinces. With so demonstratively uncharitable and dismissive an ear in Quebec City, federalist leaders will have to speak directly to the people of Quebec.

At the same time, the Jewish community in the rest of Canada will have to speak to the community in Quebec, reaching out, becoming involved, understanding, empathizing, and assisting in weathering the existential anxiety and emotional fatigue of the separation debates looming again on the horizon.

... in Israel

In forming his cabinet, Prime Minister Shimon Peres has signalled his desire to try to restore the "historic alliance" between the Labor party and the religious establishment. A restoration of the alliance will go a long way to allaying the fears of the moderate settler community regarding the government's intentions for the peace process. It will also lend a measure of parliamentary stability until the elections scheduled for October 1996.

The prime minister's first step in that direction was to appoint Rav Yehuda Amital, rosh yeshivah of Yeshivat Har Etzion, as minister without portfolio. His second step was to contact the National Religious Party, Shas and United Torah Judaism to inquire into the feasibility of their joining a coalition with Labor. As of this writing, these contacts have not led to an agreement. Speaking to reporters about his coalition efforts, Peres said that "the biggest mistake" of the Labor party was to push religious Jews toward its political opposition. His government "has no intention to deepen the gulf between the religious and the secular segments of the population ... But as things stand, there is a new openness on our side and I sense openness on theirs too. Why should we not engage in dialogue?"

In this endeavour, we wish the prime minister every success.

No solution in strident debate

I read the article by Rabbi Reuben J. Poupko (CJN Nov. 2) and though I do not usually respond to polemics in the media, I felt the need to comment on his remarks.

He presents the position of those who strongly support the current peace process as a desire for normalization, a desire for the Jewish people to attain "their rightful place in the community of nations." He goes on to note that the "Oslo accords have made life for North American Jews much easier." American Jews can be relieved of the stigma and burden of supporting unpopular policies. By contrast, Rabbi Poupko describes the Orthodox as those who find that "defending Israel's unpopular policies was never a burden and association with Israel never a stigma."

In regard to this latter point, it is interesting to note that in the early days of the Yishuv, a number of Orthodox rabbis were opposed to Jews building with their own hands a political entity in Eretz Israel. Indeed such activity was strongly stigmatized in some circles and the debate became acrimonious. Now the opposite view prevails among the religious extreme, where it is seen as a sacred duty to hold on to every piece of land in the West Bank (Judea and Samaria) regardless of the political consequences.

Rabbi Poupko has a pejorative way of describing those who support the peace process. It is not the primary motivation of such people to be welcomed by the rest of the world and to be comfortably accepted, as Rabbi Poupko would have you believe. For many who support the peace process, the normalization of relationships with the Arabs is seen as a more certain guarantee of real peace in the region than the continuation of hegemonous attitudes about territory. Furthermore, many believe that this process, by normalizing life for Israelis, will unleash their creativity in new directions, including the development of modern technologies and original approaches to rapprochement between groups in conflict.

Rabbi Poupko goes on to disingenuously tell us that he and his colleagues are deeply concerned about the security of Israel — as if those supporting the peace movement are somehow less concerned. He describes examples of how in matters of security, trust and Jerusalem, one cannot trust Arafat and his minions nor the current government and its leading negotiators who in any event, are functioning like "beggars of hope." The people supporting the peace process may be wrong (although I believe they are right), but at least should be treated with respect.

It would be easy for me to say that Rabbi Poupko represents those who have an ideological agenda and that he is masking it with his expressions of concern for Israel's security. I am not and will not make this allegation. I simply note that the anxiety that he and a number of his colleagues feel about Israel's capacity to defend itself capably is not shared by many others. We feel that Israel is strong enough to do what is necessary to secure its future. Indeed I would suggest that Israel's future will be most secure when peace between it and its Arab neighbors is achieved.

The recent assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin occurred in an atmosphere in which the character of political discourse in Israel has deteriorated considerably. Many people, including Orthodox rabbis, had referred to Rabin as a traitor or worse. One even let it be known that his assassination would not be a tragedy. This kind of rhetoric is as severe a threat to Israel's democracy as the behavior of Hamas and Islamic Jihad. It will not be blunted by the kind of musings presented by Rabbi Poupko. Indeed his unwillingness to be respectful and appropriately tolerant to those whose political views he opposes exemplifies a problem which is growing steadily in the Jewish world.

It is time to put an end to bitter recriminations and unpleasant rhetoric afflicting the Jewish people. A failure to do so has no doubt contributed to the present tragedy which we have just witnessed. In the final analysis, as our history has shown, it is internecine conflict that will truly make us vulnerable to those who wish us ill.

Disappointed by Rabin memorial

I was very disappointed with the Toronto Jewish community's memorial to Yitzhak Rabin, held at Centennial Arena. After a thoughtful beginning of song and prayer, the evening quickly became a meaningless orgy of speeches.

As a member of the 6,000 who attended, I could see the restlessness and impatience among those around me, as we became passive observers of one speaker after another. We did not come to listen to politicians. We did not come to hear power-tripping Jewish community officials tell us of their last encounter with Rabin. We did not come to hear the UJA remind us to have our wallets ready when they call. We came to sing together, pray together, and to collectively share in our grief. Instead, we attended an unimaginative evening that made us into observers rather than participants. The organizers of the event showed that they are out of touch with the needs of people they assume to serve.

Each survivor's testimony is vital

Recent issues of The CJN contained articles about the lack of response to Steven Spielberg's videotaping of survivors' testimony in Toronto. We are writing to inform your readers that historical documentation through the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's Witness-to-History project is doing very well.

The project started in April 1994. To date, 150 testimonies have been recorded by about 50 intensively trained volunteer interviewers. The project aims at maintaining authentic personal recollection of events as evidence against revisionism and Holocaust denial.

Perspectives

Canadian Jewry's eventful past

Earlier this year, The CJN carried a six-part series about the Jews of Canada. With the last installment in that series, we promised a wrap-up essay on the subject, the first part of which we provide today. The second part follows next week.

By GERALD TULCHINSKY

When World War I ended, Canada's 125,000 Jews faced an uncertain future both at home and in the larger Jewish world. While Canadian Jews rejoiced at the future prospects of stability and equality for their families in Eastern Europe, the Zionists among them took heart at the prospect of achieving a "Jewish national home" in Palestine following the British government's Balfour Declaration, the League of Nations mandate and the appointment of a Jew, Sir Herbert Samuel, as high commissioner for Palestine.

At home, the Jewish community looked forward to a promising future. Three national organizations, the Zionist Organization of Canada, the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Hadassah Organization of Canada provided structure and direction.

Bright prospects were soon clouded over, however. The bitter and protracted legal fight with Montreal's Protestant School Commission over Jewish rights in the schools erupted again. Jews were not allowed membership on the commission and the few Jewish teachers employed by the board were confined to "separate but equal" schools in the Jewish populated centretown wards. Jewish pupils reported humiliating treatment in classrooms.

Anti-Semitism, while serious, did not impede the steady improvement in the economic, social and political advancement of Jews in Canadian life. Two Jews had even gained election to the House of Commons.

Anti-Semitism in the early 1920s was extremely damaging to the community. Immigration restrictions on Jews and others were severely tightened and remained in effect until after World War II. Thus, personal contact with Jews in Eastern Europe was interrupted, except by mail and occasional visits by travellers, which brought European Jewish ideas and personal news to Canada. Even family reunification was halted, and contact with the Jews in the Soviet Union was effectively terminated.

Anti-Semitism in both English and French Canada took many forms, including the Ku Klux Klan and Achat Chez Nous in the 1920s and Nazis and Silvershirts in the 1930s. These manifestations were accompanied by the fulminations of Abbé Groulx, André Laurendeau, Adrien Arcand and many Anglo-Canadian anti-Semites (notably certain Alberta-based Social Credits), Jew-hatred imported from Europe and the attacks of American Jew-baiters whose messages were received by radio.

In 1934, the Canadian Jewish Congress was reactivated to combat these messages of hate, not all of which were verbal. In August 1933, an anti-Semitic riot started in Toronto at Christie Pits. Fighting escalated from fisticuffs to the use of heavy clubs and lasted for six hours before Toronto's chief of police, the notorious General Draper, ordered in the riot squad and all police reserves. A number of Jews were arrested.

But the main threat to the Canadian Jewish community was political and social. Besides trying to obtain entry permits for Jews fleeing Germany during the 1930s, the Congress' chief agenda was to unite Canadian Jewry and to monitor and, where possible, confront anti-Semitism. The Congress was the parliament of Canadian Jewry and under the presidency of Sam Bronfman, from the late 1930s on, it assumed economic prestige and importance in Jewish public life.

Anti-Semitism was also obvious in Canadian universities. Aspiring Jewish academics faced great difficulty in securing appointments. At the University of Manitoba and McGill medical schools, Jewish entry was severely limited, while admission to the McGill faculties of Arts and Science and of Engineering required Jewish entrants to have a 10-point higher general average on their high school results than non-Jews. Jewish doctors had such a tough time getting admitting privileges to the city hospitals in Montreal and Toronto that the communities were persuaded to build their own hospitals.

French Canadian anti-Semitism remained serious from the 1920s. The Jewish community was seized by mounting fears — and not just in Quebec — because the Canadian anti-Semitism of the 1930s was part of a world phenomenon. Events in Poland, Germany and Romania, where anti-Semitism flourished, were on Jewish minds, just as much as, or perhaps more than events in Quebec, worrisome though they were. Canadian Jews saw the whole world turning anti-Semitic.

GOLDA THE EMISSARY

Golda Myerson (subsequently to become Golda Meir) was an early emissary from the Holy Land. She is seen here in 1929 at the Mount Royal look-out in the company of Montreal Zionist leaders. Inset is a poster from a Montreal rally celebrating the founding of the State of Israel. [The Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC, 1995]

Although Montreal did not have an anti-Semitic riot to compare with Toronto's Christie Pits, the strike at Notre Dame Hospital against Dr. Samuel Rabinovich, the stoning of Jewish funeral processions and fisticuffs during street confrontations bore evidence of considerable Jew hatred.

From the end of World War II to 1973, anti-Semitism in Canada went underground, as the Holocaust and the rise of the State of Israel combined to force hatred of Jews off the cultural map of Canada and the rest of the English-speaking world — but not completely. Housing restrictions remained legal in Canada until the 1950s, quotas on Jews in some universities remained operative until the early 1960s and private clubs still are legally able to exclude Jews among other "undesirables." As sociologist John Porter pointed out in Vertical Mosaic published in 1964, Jews were not yet admissible to Canada's corporate boardrooms, to employment in banks, insurance and trust companies, or to certain occupations like engineering. But in the 1960s and 1970s, the great hatred seemed to diminish; in French Canada, the Parti Québécois tried to suppress the old nationalist tradition of clerical fascism.

In the 1970s, however, anti-Semitism began to make a public reappearance, with James Keegstra's "teachings," Ernst Zundel's Holocaust denial and Malcolm Ross' publications causing concern. In recent years, there has been an increase in the number of desecrations of Canadian synagogues and cemeteries. B'nai Brith reported that between 1988 and 1992, reports of anti-Semitic "incidents" increased by more than 500 per cent. Warren Kinsella's recently published Web of Hate: the Far-Right Network in Canada carefully documents the rise of potentially dangerous racist and anti-Semitic groups in Canada.

But should Canada's Jews worry seriously about these manifestations? While anti-Semitism is a potentially murderous beast, Canadian Jewry must not allow concern to distort the past where, in large measure, anti-Semitism was a dog that did not bite very deeply here. It did not stop Jews from integrating into virtually all levels of Canadian society from the federal cabinet, the Senate and top positions in the civil service, to the presidency of universities. Integration continues apace. Indeed, Jews now are so well integrated that serious concerns have been expressed about the future of traditional Jewish distinctiveness.

The community still lives in the shadow of the Holocaust, however. This cataclysm has entered Jewish consciousness as no other of our many disasters and it is now a major component of the Canadian Jewish outlook on both the past and the present Besides the loss of six million amidst unrelieved horror, the Holocaust marks the end of history for Eastern European Jewry, an event of enormous historical importance. For most of Canada's Jews, whose grandparents and parents migrated from Eastern Europe, the past no longer continues into the present as it does for other immigrants. The Jews of Eastern Europe and their 1,000-year-old civilization of incalculable richness no longer exist, although they are still part of Canadian Jewry's historical memory. Above all, the Holocaust created a new historical consciousness which, to some, bears a series of worrisome "lessons" about modern Jewish history. Memorials, Holocaust centres, films like Schindler's List, even the search for Nazi war criminals, do not help mourning, healing or understanding. And while philosopher Emil Fackenheim asserts that, because of the Holocaust, Jews must now obey an additional mitzvah "not to give Hitler a posthumous victory," still the meaning of that apocalypse escapes us.

Among the most important post-Holocaust Jewish expressions of renewal, Zionism in its many forms drew mounting interest after 1948. Canadian Zionists, most of them Eastern European Jews, carried the idea of national redemption in their souls. Hundreds volunteered in 1917 to join the Jewish Legion recruited to liberate Palestine from the Ottoman Empire. A few joined the kibbutzim, and in 1948 and 1949, about 240 joined the foreign volunteer units of the Israeli Army. A Canadian Jew, Dov Joseph, became a member of the Israeli cabinet; another, Joe Weiner, established the tank corps of the Israeli army; others helped to organize the air force; still others performed important service in providing supplies for the State of Israel in its early years. This was not all. Considerable efforts were made to secure early official recognition for the new state. All this work for Israel helped enormously to strengthen the Canadian Jewish community and provide its leaders with a focus of unparalleled cohesiveness.

By the 1960s, it seemed as if the whole of Canadian Jewry was swept up in Israelism. Israel-centredness sometimes dominated the community's agenda. This was not just fundraising (though such campaigns became extremely significant for internal cohesiveness), but propaganda and money collected and dispatched to Israel. An estimated 50 per cent of all funds raised in the United Jewish Appeal campaigns went to Israel. Voices of dissent concerning Israel's policies were expressed in the columns of the Canadian Jewish Outlook, a Vancouver-based leftish monthly which serves as virtually the only voice of dissent within the community, on Zionism as well as on other issues. On the Canadian left, however, Jewish anti-establishment views could be found elsewhere as well, notably on university campuses where some Jewish students and professors expressed opposition to Israel's policies.

Zionist influence in the Canadian Jewish community increased significantly in the 1980s. All major Jewish organizations are strong supporters of Israel. Virtually all Jewish schools have Zionist education programs and sponsor visits to Israel to foster an enhanced attachment to the homeland. Perhaps a new agenda will be written to reflect the fact that Israel might now help to rejuvenate the faltering communities in the Diaspora, including Canada's. Even some Israeli political figures and intellectuals, enthused by the economic boom that followed the 1993 peace accord, have argued that Israel no longer needs financial and political help from world Jewry and can now enrich Diaspora Jewish culture and education.

Gerald Tulchinsky is a professor of History at Queen's University, Kingston, Ont. He is the author of Taking Root: The origins of the Canadian Jewish Community, Lester Publishing Limited, 1992.

Opinions

Right and wrong in the debate

Three weeks after the cold-blooded assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the aftershocks are being felt. Beneath the surface, the wound is still smarting, and the divisions that wrack the country are out in the open again. Many of those who speak of the need for "unity" in its aftermath simply seek agreement with their own position, and in the renewed debate, too much has already gone wrong. There are three troubling trends that can only exacerbate, rather than attenuate, the polarization.

By Shira Herzog

The first is the tendency of some on the "left" to tar all those on the "right" and in the "religious" community with the same brush, because of the stated religious motive for the killing. In some instances, this stems from ignorance, but in others, it stems from a desire to make political hay and to settle old scores in the ongoing debate over religion and politics in Israel. This is simplistic, unwarranted and damaging to the fragile fabric of Israeli society.

The second is the tendency of some on the "right" and in the religious community to be defensive and even equivocal in their reactions to the terrible event, supposedly because of the "witch hunt" from the left. This too is wrong, and disingenuous. The soul-searching that is required as a result of Rabin's death is required not because of criticism from the other side, but because of an internal moral imperative. And there are no "buts" when it comes to condemning the murder. It has to be placed beyond the pale of political and religious discourse, then the debate can resume, within the framework of the rule of law in a democracy.

The third tendency is the disturbing analysis of who introduced Holocaust imagery against Israeli government leaders. Was it the left during the Lebanon war of 1982, or was it the right in reaction to the Oslo accords? It doesn't really matter who was first — this should never have been done ... The use of Holocaust-related language to score political points today is an exploitation of the unique, horrific event that the Holocaust was. Such language is meant to generate strong reactions because of the emotions it evokes, and it can irresponsibly inflame the atmosphere.

The challenge facing Israel today is not to pretend that divisions should no longer exist — although each side would dearly like that to be the case — but to re-establish a civil framework for the debate that will allow Israelis to emerge from these difficult times together. Israelis are divided on political and religious questions, and their democracy has been sorely tested. If the shock of the assassination exposed the country's greatest vulnerability from within, it was that, at the end of the day, there might not be sufficient civility, tolerance and common ground to coexist as a people who acknowledge differences.

Fortunately, there are voices of moderation that are speaking out. They may not be as attractive for media coverage as the voices of confrontation, but they are essential for Israel's future. These are a few examples. Last week, Yossi Beilin, a cabinet minister and close confidant of Shimon Peres, said, "We have to try to mend some of the fissures that have occurred, perhaps because of our own insensitivity. We had the feeling that we could make peace without considering or listening enough to the voices among the people. We contributed to the creation of two camps that no longer communicate ... We have to prepare for the day after the peace is signed, because we cannot find ourselves in a torn and fragmented country."

Rabbi Yehuda Amital, of the Religious Zionist movement, Meimad, has for long spoken forcefully of the need for a re-examination of the values and teachings that have spawned the development of a zealotry in the extreme religious nationalist community. He said last week, "Everyone has to engage in soul searching, the left and the right, but this does not absolve the religious Zionist community ... We never believed this [the killing] could happen ... we have to undertake a serious process of re-examination and thought ... that will lead to a distancing of extreme elements from our midst ... We must work to increase unity and against hatred."

And last week in New York, several Holocaust survivors published a call for a halt to the use of Holocaust vocabulary because "this reckless rhetoric not only trivializes the Shoah ... it also betrays ignorance of what the Holocaust was ... Language matters ..."

Our sages said long ago, "the tongue has power over life and death." Israeli author Amos Oz said in Toronto after the assassination, "Words can kill, and words can heal." Voices of moderation cannot make political and religious differences disappear, but they can provide the right tone for the debate, and they may help to heal the open wound we all share. Here and in Israel, such voices should be raised, should be heard and should be supported.

Education, continuity and klal Israel

The concern for Jewish continuity has for some time been reverberating through the Jewish world, fuelled by the fear of rising rates of assimilation and intermarriage. But amidst the gloom, some rays of hope have been able to shine through. Jewish education, in informal experiments or formal school settings, can make a difference.

By Morton Weinfeld

Last year I evaluated a mid-western American Conservative synagogue, which had undertaken a concerted effort to raise Shabbat observance among its members. To my surprise, I found clear evidence that after roughly two years of this program — a kind of "inreach" as opposed to "outreach" — various measures of Shabbat observance had indeed increased. Such experiments are underway in many congregations and have greater potential than conventional adult education programs.

Even more heartening are the results of the latest research on the impact of formal Jewish schooling on subsequent Jewish identification. Two recent large scale American studies show positive effects of Jewish education, even after controlling for the level of parents' Jewish commitments. Day school education has the greatest impact by far, but afternoon school is also found to have a measurable effect. What is not clear is which specific elements of day school or supplementary school education produce the best results, and with which students.

The challenge here is to make Jewish education more attractive and affordable to Canadian Jewish families, so that more children can be involved. The needs and opportunities are perhaps greatest among the non-Orthodox. In this group enrolment rates are lower and the role which education may have to play in the Jewish socialization of the child is greater.

The goals of Jewish education are usually increased Judaic knowledge and observation of Jewish rituals. But in the wake of the tragic assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, Jewish educators in Israel and in the Diaspora are posing additional questions about the objectives of Jewish education.

For some time, groups of Jews — left or right, religious and non-religious — have been demonizing other Jews. Stereotypes and prejudices have been flourishing, even before the escalation of the political rhetoric over the peace process. Some non-Orthodox Jews see in any knitted yarmulke or Likud supporter a symbol of murderous fanaticism. Conversely, some in the Orthodox community see secular Jews or Jews committed to the peace process as traitors to the Jewish people, or worse.

This proliferation of sinat chinam is unconscionable. When the Nazis set out to exterminate European Jewry, they did not distinguish between types of Jews. The bodies of chassidic and secular Jews, left- and right-wingers, fell side by side.

Similarly, some Jews have forgotten that every Jew — indeed every human being — is created b'tselem elokim. Our tradition teaches that every Jew contains within himself or herself a spark of the Divine.

What role, if any, can Jewish education play in trying to heal these open wounds? The issue is not straightforward. Jewish day schools and supplementary schools enjoy a deserved autonomy, and often reflect the values of groups of parents. The diversity of Jewish life is one of our greatest strengths and this pluralism must be respected and nurtured.

But can Jewish educators seek to find greater common ground, based on the concepts of klal Israel and ahavat Israel? Most schools endorse these concepts and teach them to their students. There are rallies or festivals which involve several schools. But perhaps more can be done such as face to face encounters among our youth.

Some readers may have seen the film Bonjour Shalom, which deals with tensions in the city of Outremont between Chassidic residents and their French Quebecois neighbors. One scene depicts a first time visit of a group of young French girls to a local Chassidic girls' school. Despite the awkwardness of the encounter, the visit was a modest attempt to break down a wall of prejudice and ignorance and find a common humanity.

Is it unrealistic to hope for similar encounters within the spectrum of Jewish youth? The objectives should not be proselytization of one group by another. There are risks that such efforts may backfire. But some creativity, goodwill and careful planning of such programs might help to humanize those who are now strangers.

In Canada we at times assign to public schools the task of solving difficult social problems. For example, we seek to lessen adult racism in our society by developing anti-racist curricula. A new challenge facing Jewish educators is whether the goal of creating a minimal inter-communal tolerance can be added to those of the Jewish continuity agenda.

Thoughts on the assassination

Yigal Amir, the prime minister's alleged murderer, comes from a pious Yemenite family. That very fact makes the foul deed even sadder, for the Yemenite community has been cherished in Israel for its hard work and exemplary civil behavior.

By Rabbi. Gunther Plaut

Amir claimed that he heard the "voice of God." By personal revelation or through the teachings of rabbis to whom he listened? More likely the latter, for he was brought up in a culture that taught him to revere the words of his teachers.

And some of them discussed — among themselves and in public — the question whether it was a mitzvah to kill the prime minister or whether it was merely "permitted." Now these same quarters claim that all they were doing is "hold theological discussions," which were not meant to be taken literally.

That is a fatuous excuse if I ever heard one. They know that they are tainted with the blood of Yitzhak Rabin and now beat a hasty retreat. (I don't want to believe that any of them are privately happy that their disquisition had such an immediate effect, or that they approved of the celebration reported from Kfar Tapuach.) The passage in Pirkei Avot, quoted in the name of Rabbi Shimon, son of Gamaliel, comes to mind: "Whoever talks too much is likely to cause others to commit a sin."

Unfortunately, the public level of Israeli discourse had been at an all-time low, and the same development has infected North American society as well. Says Tom Schachtman, author of The Inarticulate Society: Vitriolic and even violent speech on radio and televised shows have contributed to a breakdown of democratic communication, and therefore, democratic culture.

One of the unfortunate byproducts of this tragic affair is the increased disrespect for rabbinic authority in Israel and elsewhere. The gap between secular and observant Jews has been further widened — and it was wide already. The daily newspaper Yediot Achronot reported the following which should give everyone food for thought: Yigal Amir evaded security by posing as a limousine driver. He gained the trust of the security guards when he took off his yarmulke.

Meaning what? That someone who professes publicly to religious observance is suspect, while someone who doesn't, is not? That a person without a kippah could not possibly belong to the religious fringe which advocated or discussed murder and was therefore not dangerous?

All of which came after Yitzhak Rabin and the hundred thousand in the square had finished the peace song:

So sing a song for peace
Don't whisper your wish
Better sing a song for peace
Shouting it out loud ...
Sing songs to love and not songs of war.

The consoling element in the tragedy was the presence of young people, both in Israel and at the rally of 7,000 we held in Toronto. Aanachnu kan, they seemed to say. "We are here, you can still count on us."

And there is something else. In a trenchant article, William Rees-Mogg traversed the history of modern assassinations and concluded that every time the murder brought about exactly the opposite of what the murderer wanted to achieve. In this case, instead of hampering or even halting the peace process, it is likely to accelerate it.

Someone put it this way: Violence can kill power, but it isn't power.

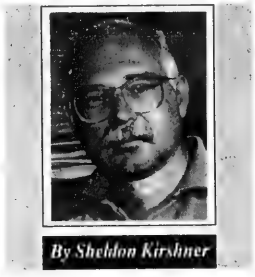
Anne Frank revisited in documentary



By Sheldon Kirshner

It seemed like a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

"When I discovered that, somehow, no one had ever attempted to make a documentary on the complete story of Anne Frank, it was too tempting to resist," explained British filmmaker Jon Blair, whose moving two-hour film, Anne Frank Remembered, was screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival.

The project took root in July 1994, when the Anne Frank Educational Trust in London — the British branch of the Anne Frank House and Museum in Amsterdam — approached Blair.

In 1983, he had won a major British award for Schindler, his ground-breaking film about Oskar Schindler, the German who saved more than 1,000 Jews from the jaws of death.

"After Schindler, I had no interest in touching World War II material again, let alone the Holocaust," said Blair. "I wasn't going to make a career out of the Holocaust, the Shoah business. I didn't want to be a 'Jewish' filmmaker."

Curiosity, however, impelled Blair to investigate the matter. When he was satisfied that there had never been "a full telling" of Anne Frank's story on the screen, his enthusiasm grew.

What finally clinched the deal, he noted in an interview at a downtown Toronto hotel, were the sweeteners promised by the Anne Frank House and Museum and the Anne Frank Foundation in Switzerland.

He was granted permission to recreate, then photograph, the furnishings in the Franks' secret hiding place in Amsterdam.

He obtained the rights to use extracts from Anne Frank's diary as part of the documentary's voiceover.

He was given access to the Anne Frank Museum's database and permitted to hire three of its researchers.

He wheedled the right to use never-before-seen footage of Anne Frank. The 1941 clip, showing Anne looking out her window, was from a Jewish wedding. (Computerized techniques brought it back to compelling life.)

He was granted unprecedented access to the Frank family photographic collection.

And he was assured of help in tracking down eye witnesses — notably Bernd Elias, Anne's first cousin on her father's side and one of her last living blood relatives; Miep Gies, the Dutch woman who provided the Franks and their boarders with food and information; Hanneli Goslar, Anne's friend from the age of four who is mentioned extensively in her diary; Sal and Rose De Liema, who met the Franks at the Westerbork concentration camp; Peter Pepper, the son of the dentist who shared Anne's room in the secret annex; and Isa Baschwitz, whose parents were friends of Otto and Edith Frank, Anne's father and mother.

Blair — a 45-year-old former South African who left his homeland in 1966 to avoid military service — received financial support from the British Broadcasting Corporation and the Disney Channel, but was still short of funding.

The film would cost $800,000 (US), a considerable sum for a documentary.

At one point, he nearly lost hope of securing the required funds and was on the verge of abandoning the project. But then director Steven Spielberg put up an undisclosed amount that enabled Blair to proceed.

Time was of essence. The 50th anniversary of the end of World War II, an ideal platform for a film about Anne, was less than a year away and Blair had to scramble.

He met his deadline, and Anne Frank Remembered — which is in contention for a 1996 Academy Award — had its premiere on the BBC last spring.

Since then, it has been broadcast on the Disney Channel and has been seen at the Montreal International Film Festival, in Los Angeles and in Australia. The Dutch public will get the chance to see it later this year, and if Blair's discussions with North American distributors bear fruit, it will be released in commercial theatres fairly soon.

Curiously enough, neither Israel nor Germany has bought the film, and Blair is not surprised. "Anne Frank doesn't have the same resonance in Israel as in North America. As for the Germans, maybe they have been exposed to a surfeit of films about the Holocaust."

He is pleased that the Anne Frank House and Museum liked the film. "I think they appreciated it," he said. "Certainly, we're still friends."

In his view, Anne Frank Remembered propagates a message of tolerance and hope and contributes to the ceaseless battle against racism, discrimination and anti-Semitism.

"This is also a film about today," he observed. "They didn't call it 'ethnic cleansing' 50 years ago."

Blair is not especially concerned by the reaction of Holocaust revisionists, who, doubtless, will take umbrage. "They're an irrelevance, really. I don't believe that the vast proportion of late 20th century mankind gives them much credence. But if the film is useful in the fight against them, fine. Neo-Nazis are dangerous when they're armed with bombs. They are never going to respond to reason."

In making Anne Frank Remembered, Blair hoped to portray her as a person rather than as an icon. He has succeeded. In his hands, she emerges as an intelligent, feisty and inquisitive girl who had just begun to come to terms with her womanhood.

Blair does not subscribe to her unbridled optimism and her unalloyed faith in humanity. Was she naive? No, he said. "She was a girl of her age. How many of us want to be judged for posterity on the basis of writings between the ages of 13 and 15?"

Needless to say, Blair was unable to cram all his material into this tour de force. Indeed, he was forced to omit an obscure but important fact. Anne, an aspiring journalist, wrote several children's books (which were later published). "She had remarkable potential as a writer," he said.

One can only imagine what prose might have flowed from her pen had she survived the Holocaust.

A potpourri of books...

A potpourri of recently-published books ...

"The Russians," wrote Anton Chekhov, "idolize the past, hate the present and fear the future." Mindful of this aphorism, the anti-Semitic, self-hating, half-Jewish demagogue, Vladimir Wolfovich Zhirinovsky, has risen to the apex of Russian politics.

His chauvinistic views, which earned him 24 per cent of the popular vote in Russia's 1993 presidential election, have been conveniently compiled in Absolute Zhirinovsky (Penguin, $9.99) by Graham Frazer and George Lancelle, two seasoned British journalists.

Forty thousand Ethiopian Jews have arrived in Israel in the past two decades. Life in the Jewish state has profoundly affected them. In Surviving Salvation (New York University Press, $24.95 US), Ruth Westheimer (yes, Dr. Ruth) and Steve Kaplan deftly analyze their absorption, or lack thereof, into Israeli society.

With the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, the mainly Muslim republics of Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan and Azerbaijan gained independence. In Between Marx and Muhammad (HarperCollins, $38.95), Dilip Hiro, a respected specialist on Muslim affairs, speculates how these Central Asian entities may develop and react to the challenge of Islamic fundamentalism.

Jews have played an enormously important role in the development of the movie industry, both as executives and actors. Flip through the informative pages of The Film Encyclopedia (HarperCollins, $35) by Ephraim Katz and Halliwell's Film Guide (HarperCollins, $29.50) and you will be enlightened. These are excellent reference books.

Compassion's voice must be heard

By RABBI IRVIN S. BEIGEL

There is an old story of the Jewish child in school for the first time. As the teacher called the roll, each child yelled out "present." When little Moishe heard his name, he responded in a loud, clear voice, "I pledge chai."

Jewish philanthropy has often been the butt of jokes, but it has also been a profound source of Jewish pride.

Across North America, governments are cutting social welfare programs in order to balance the budget. There is a callous attitude to the poor which is to be found across the continent. Those in need are identified as "them," a group different and apart from "us." Cutting welfare payments is often rationalized by citing instances of abuse or fraud. And those truly in need increasingly go without food, shelter and clothing. For many, the cold winter months will erode health, devastate self-esteem and in too many cases, end lives. How do we as Jews respond?

To be sure, there are those who abuse the welfare system, as there are politicians who abuse their office and the wealthy who abuse the tax system. There are no calls to do away with Parliament or to do away with taxes. Most would agree that those who cheat and steal should be punished appropriately. In the same way, we as a society, have a responsibility not only to end welfare abuse, but to provide for the needs of the poor in ways which preserve human dignity.

Jewish tradition sees tzedakah from two perspectives: that of the giver and that of the recipient. The Torah was unique in the ancient world in making it mandatory to provide for the poor. The farmer was required to leave a corner of his field for the poor to harvest. If he neglected this duty, he was guilty of stealing what belonged to the poor.

Rabbinic law further defined our responsibility to support those in need. Everyone, including one dependent on charity, was expected to give to tzedakah according to his ability. Giving to tzedakah teaches the giver to be compassionate. The tradition insists over and over again that no matter how weak, vulnerable and powerless a person may be, we must preserve his or her dignity. Jewish tradition insists that we not ostracize those in need. "They" are "us."

Maimonides praises those who give and receive charity anonymously. The most praiseworthy form of tzedakah, however, is to help a person find a job so that he or she is no longer dependent on the community for survival. Yet when a person is in need, we are to provide food, clothing, home furnishings and even help the single person who is in need to marry.

The kind of society, the kind of nation that we build, the kind of people that we are, is demonstrated by how we treat the weak and those who lack the necessities of life. The voice of Jewish compassion needs to be heard today as never before.

Rabbi Beigel is the assistant rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

A Beantown brush with Sinai

By LYNDA McGRAW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

You may not remember this, but you were at Mount Sinai when it happened. We were all there. All 600,000 Jewish souls that exist at any time were there. So that means that you, too, experienced the revelation. It was incredible. Literally.

Although G-d generally makes miracles that we mortals can relate to and understand, this one was different because there was a supernatural element to it. Everyone present felt it, and without modems, cellphones or a audio-visual superscreen.

We are not really certain what happened at Mount Sinai when we officially became a couple — that is, G-d and the Jewish people. Some of the sages say it was a sound that everyone heard at exactly the same time. Some say that Moshe Rabeinu, who was G-d's lay leader and the MC of the event, had to yell at the men and address the women in a softer tone, because the girls knew the sound. Whatever the case might have been, it was clearly a Jewish communal event on the grandest scale.

And since that time, it seems that we have been struggling to recreate the sound of Sinai. We came up with the shloshah regalim — the pilgrimage to the Temple. When the Second Temple was destroyed, we followed the Greek lead and built smaller temples wherever we settled, with the Aron HaKodesh facing eastward, toward Jerusalem.

For four days last week, I had the distinct pleasure of walking around an enclosed glass Cardo and Coliseum of sorts with a good portion of my fellow 600,000 Jewish souls in Boston. The occasion was the Council of Jewish Federations' General Assembly (GA). It was also the 100th anniversary of Boston's Jewish federation.

There was a buzz. The look on the faces of these 5,000 or so Jewish communal leaders and philanthropists was pure light. And there was a sound reminiscent of something out of our collective past. It was festive, cordial; rife with infighting, dispute, discourse; laced with consensus and the total lack of consensus. It was a tribal sound. Because however you slice it, we are a tribe. And for some reason, despite all our politics and gehakteh Yiddishe tsuris, we are possessed of an innate urge to gather together. To recreate the sound of Sinai.

Guest Voices

The sound of Sinai has been with us throughout Jewish history. It was heard during the flourishing era of the Great Synod. And during the Holocaust. It was heard at the founding of the Jewish State. And again as we witnessed the handshake on the White House lawn three years ago. And it was heard in a hail of bullets, 10 days prior to the GA. During the event itself, there was no escaping the sound of Sinai. It resonated throughout the GA. It was unavoidable. We were mourning the loss of our prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin. For the sake of my readers, I shall not enter into a requiem mode at this juncture.

This past Shabbat, sitting on a bench at the Teaneck Jewish Centre, I reflected on the events of the past several weeks. Suddenly, I felt my eyes mist, and I lost it for the first time since hearing the news of Rabin's murder. It happened during the post-Torah reading of the Shmoneh Esrei, just as I read the passage, "Yehi ratzon milfanechah ... sheyibaneh Beit Hamikdash bimheira beyamenu." The sound of Sinai.

For the first time since Rabin's murder shattered our innocence, I found myself among my neighbors in my hometown shul near the corner of my street, beseeching and crying for G-d to rebuild our Temple — to make that job top priority. If ever we need a little closeness to the root of our cause, it's now, Lord. Not that I'm in the habit of ordering G-d around, G-d forbid.

Despite the tears and even despite the partying I did there, I am still high from my Beantown brush with Mount Sinai. I remember with total recall the conditions under which I accepted the Torah. That even if I should forget why I'm fighting the fight to keep my people Jewish, I should be strong enough to continue on the road. That even if I stop believing in G-d, I should believe in the Jewish people. And if ever I should lose my faith in the Jewish people, I should remember with total recall the light and sound of those who attended the General Assembly in Boston.

A Scroll of Remembrance, by Donia Blumenfeld Clenman Flowerfield & Littleman, $11.95).

Older and in Love, by Donia Blumenfeld Clenman (Flowerfield & Littleman, $11.95).

Donia Blumenfeld Clenman is an exceedingly busy woman — poet, children's author, lyricist and lecturer. She participates in forums, addresses high school and university students on such subjects as race relations, Israel and the enduring meaning of the Holocaust, presents dramatic readings from her books and shares in the creation of films, tapes and musical compositions.

Recently, her poem, Rainbow Symphony, set to music by Srul Glick, was presented as part of his Triumph of the Spirit, which commemorated the Toronto Mendelssohn centenary. Her poems have won international awards and are included in several anthologies.

The child of a devout Polish family, she spent her youth in the Warsaw Ghetto and in a number of concentration camps. Her father died in the ovens of Treblinka and "out of an extended family of 74, there were six living survivors and one walking dead." She was liberated from the Czestochowa Camp in January 1945, a date forever engraved in her memory, and has been a resident of Toronto since 1948.

In I Remember, the poet confesses, "But most of all I remember / my grandfather's patriarchal beard / and his mighty chee-ree-bimboms; / the musty Polish synagogue / where penguin-like Chassidim / would drop their puritan plumage / and obey the call of love / to sway with wild abandon, / kissing the sacred pages, / their dance quickening to match blood's ardor, / the rising voices weaving wordless melodies, / Song of Songs to His Beloved."

Although no stranger to inhumanity, the poet is not bereft of hope: "I don't know why / I, of all people, / still peddle hope. / It must be this fool Isaiah / and those stiff-necked Jews — / Ezekiel, Akiba, Jeremiah, / and the babbling, ecstatic Chassidim / hopping around a musty scroll — / no matter what / no matter when and why. / Though hope gave them up / they would not."

With Isaac is an exuberant embrace of the Israeli landscape. "But at dusk / when mauve mists / take the earth / to their breasts, / and stark mountains / flow with milk and honey, / my soul is restored / and with Isaac I walk / in the field of the eventide."

Golda Meir, a subject of praise, evokes compelling images. "Golda Meir, / Ambassador, / who in a sloppy dress / greeted the British and Russians / with dignity. / Fun Lady, / 'Paramount Chief-Initiated,' / bright eyed, bright-robed, / frolicking with Liberia's chieftains, / and singing on Lapland's frozen lakes ... your wrinkles as deep as history, / Goldale, / most beautiful daughter / of the world."

In A Ballad of Peace, there is a reaching out for a future time of universal understanding when, "And the sun will come out sweet and golden, / and the moon velvet against the sky, / and a poem will bloom / in the middle of the desert / and the soul of the world will be / a Ballad of Peace.

The poems in these slender volumes are not difficult or obscure. Readily accessible, they are meant to be savored and enjoyed. Many of them were inspired by 10 years of extended visits to Israel from 1983 to 1992. But they also include reflections on the persistence of memory, the anomalies of human behavior and the unfolding world of nature.

For Clenman, "We are all survivors ... custodians of a precious globe."

The books are available at Toronto Jewish bookstores.

Associated Hebrew Schools offers scholarships to grads

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto has announced it will be accepting applications for scholarships in higher Jewish studies.

The scholarships are granted annually to qualifying candidates, the monies coming from a special fund established by friends of Associated.

The awards are designed to assist graduates of Associated who propose to pursue post-secondary Judaic studies in a recognized institution in Israel. Priority will be given to applicants who seek to prepare themselves for a career in teaching in the Hebrew studies department of Associated Hebrew Schools.

Candidates must be graduates of Grade 8 at Associated and graduates of a recognized Jewish senior day high school or yeshivah, who have completed their formal studies (at high school, university or yeshivah).

All awards are for a single year, but the school will entertain applications for renewal. Payment of awards and renewal of awards will be conditional on receipt of satisfactory evidence that the candidate has successfully completed the program for which the award was made.

Requests for a scholarship grant must be made on forms obtainable from the Associated Hebrew Schools scholarship committee, 6100 Leslie St., Willowdale, Ont. M2H 3J1, or telephone 416-494-7666.

Deadline for receipt of applications is March 31, 1996. Applications should be for courses to be taken in the following academic year. Awards cannot be retroactive.

Miss America faced ugly episodes of anti-Semitism

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In 1945, Bess Myerson became the first (and so far, only) Jewish Miss America.

American-born Jews and newly arrived Holocaust survivors took heart from her victory, perceiving it as a symbol of opportunity for Jews in America.

The truth was not so pretty. During the contest, Myerson, the daughter of Russian immigrants who lived in the Sholom Aleichem apartment houses in the Bronx, resisted pressure to change her name to one that sounded less Jewish.

After her win, she wasn't invited by any sponsors to pose with their products, she told a Toronto audience recently.

Speaking at a State of Israel Bonds, Women's Division event at Beth Tzedec Congregation, the still-elegant septuagenarian said that "the final hurt in a terrible year" happened at a stately mansion in Wilmington, Del.

Bess Myerson

Descending the stairs in her crinolined white gown, sceptre in hand, she overheard her hostess say she hadn't known Myerson was Jewish and that she (Myerson) wouldn't be able to attend the evening's reception because it was being held at a restricted country club.

An audible collective gasp from the sizable audience, many of whom were not yet born in 1945, was testimony to progress made since that time.

Myerson's experiences led her to speak out publicly against discrimination and have been a factor in her strong support of Israel. Affiliated with the Anti-Defamation League on a national and regional level, she is also on the national advisory board of State of Israel Bonds.

Her association with Bonds dates back to 1951, when she was invited to Madison Square Gardens to launch their independence issue.

Over the past 44 years, investment in Israel Bonds has reached a total of $14 billion, facilitating expansion in various industries, as well as additional housing, jobs, schools and libraries to keep up with the influx of olim, Myerson said.

On one of her many trips to Israel, where "swords are being beaten into microchips," she was told by former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir that "there are so few of us and there's so much to do," she said.

"That's why each of us must do so much, and those of us who do nothing hurt us all ... Remember, we take care of ourselves by taking care of each other," she said.

Also participating in the evening were singer/storyteller Ritasue Fisher; Ruhama Goldstein, Israel Bonds' North American women's division chair, who introduced Myerson; and event co-chairs Malki Abrams and Debbie Kimel. Dodi Weill, chair, Women's Division, discussed Israel Bonds' new $100 (US) certificate.

Community Matters

One campaign week to go

Community backs UJA's Three Year Vision

As UJA's first Three Year Vision campaign draws to a close, co-chairs Charles Gold and Carol Kassel are excited about how well the concept has caught on.

1996 UJA Campaign Co-chair, Charles Gold

UJA canvassers sought pledges from donors not only for 1996 but for each of the following two years as well. So far, over 40% of contributors have agreed to a three year commitment.

"The response was phenomenal," Gold declared. "We only expected 20%."

Both leaders predicted that three year campaigns would soon be continent-wide. Delegates to the recent General Assembly of Federations in Boston, according to Kassel, saw Toronto's Three Year Vision as "new and different."

"Whenever anybody heard about it, they wanted details," said Kassel, who sees the Three Year Vision as a starting point for building stronger relationships with donors.

"We have achieved the beginning of our vision," she explained. "Now we have to find avenues for new gifts and develop ongoing relationships with our contributors."

UJA will not be canvassing anyone who made a three year pledge until the 1999 campaign year. It will concentrate, instead, on reaching out to non-contributors and maintaining contact with donors.

"Already, some of our three year contributors have volunteered to host gatherings," revealed Gold. "We expect more Three Year Vision supporters to come out for events.

With the 1996 campaign ending on December 6, the three year total now exceeds $60 million. After the campaign is formally finished, canvassers will still be dealing with uncovered cards and pledge redemptions. "The financial needs of those who rely on UJA are endless," said Kassel. "We're having difficulty keeping up with them."

General Assembly introduces Canadian perspective

There was a uniquely Canadian dimension this year to the 64th annual General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Boston.

The Canadian Public Policy and Human Services Institute Program included sessions on health and social welfare policy, lobbying for change and how Jewish community services can fill the void created by provincial and municipal government cutbacks. "It was a good forum for Canadian Jews to come together and discuss common challenges and goals relating to social policy," said Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto President Sandra Brown.

Susan Jackson, the Federation's Director of Continuity Programming, found the Canadian track to be "useful in promoting an understanding of how Canadian communities are finding ways to balance the continuity agenda with budget cuts."

The Canadian contingent of 40 participated with nearly 4,000 North American colleagues from 189 Jewish Federations in a memorial to the late Yitzhak Rabin, which included a live satellite broadcast from Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres. Rabin was to have been the Assembly's keynote speaker, and as UJA Campaign Director Ted Sokolsky observed, "there was an air of sadness throughout the conference" because of his absence.

Federation Executive Vice-President Allan Reitzes described the gathering in memory of Rabin as a "symbolic reaffirmation of the commitment of Diaspora Jewry." He left the conference feeling that "what we're trying to do here in Toronto is mirrored by the recommendations of other North American communities."

Dr. Arthur Kruger, joined by close to 100 community leaders, watches Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres address GA delegates by satellite from Jerusalem at the Lipa Green Building. The program was organized by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Keren Hayesod official takes home tips from Toronto visit

Janet Simons would like to model women's campaigns around the world on what she saw in Toronto and other Canadian centres.

Janet Simons

Simons, the President of Keren Hayesod's Women's Division, recently stopped in Toronto on a cross-Canada fact finding mission, where she sat in on a UJA Women's Campaign telethon. "It could be duplicated by any community in the world," she observed. "Canadian campaigns have always been well-organized and others could benefit greatly from watching how the Canadian campaigns operate."

The campaign in her home town of Sydney, Australia is, according to Simons, "based mostly on special functions and events. That's how we raise most of our money." There are 35,000-40,000 Jews in Sydney, out of a total population of 14,000,000.

One of her goals is to get more women to attend Keren Hayesod's international conferences, such as next year's Mifgash International Mission to Israel, June 10-15. Delegates will participate in the opening of the organization's Women's Division in Istanbul.

The Keren Hayesod Board of Trustees has declared 1996 the year of the Women's Division.

Simons visited Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, and Montreal on her recent trip to North America.

Mission Accomplished

Herb Rosenfeld and Rosanne Ain, the Co-chairs of Mission 3000 certainly have something to smile about. The February 19-28, 1996 mission to Israel is sold out. With over 1,200 participants from across the country, the UIA/UJA trip will be the largest Israel mission in Canadian history.

Churches seek Holocaust education

Participation by local churches in this year's Holocaust Education Week has more than doubled in three years.

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee's Robbie Engel.

Thirteen churches, representing various Christian denominations, hosted programs on the Holocaust which included video presenations, panel discussions and lectures. In 1992, only six churches were involved.

This week, at Advent Lutheran Church, congregants watched Courage to Care, a powerful documentary about the heroism of Gentiles who risked their lives to save European Jews during the Nazi occupation.

Claire Baum, who as a young child living in Holland was secretly hidden by what she calls "a succession of 25 heroes," spoke in chilling, vivid detail about how she and her sister grew up "in constant fear of betrayal."

"I survived because of the courage of others," she explained.

Joanna Wilson, a member of the Federation's Holocaust Remembrance Committee, says programs held at Holy Rosary Church and Blessed Trinity Catholic Church "went over beautifully." She was particularly pleased to see so many young people present.

Robbie Engel, who chairs the Committee's Christian Outreach subcommittee, has been coordinating church involvement in Holocaust Education Week for over 15 years.

"At the beginning," he recalled, "the goal was to design programs for the clergy. Six years later we decided to go to the pews." Engel, himself a survivor, said "the churches which have become involved over the years are the ones with the guts to face Christianity's responsiblity for anti- Semitism."

This year's Holocaust Education Week activities are especially timely, according to Edith Land, a member of the Holocaust Education Committee and Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, "in view of the marked increased of hate-related crimes all over the world."

She is happy to see how much hard work is being done by churches "to come to grips with the past. Many churches are beginning to accept that the Holocaust was a Christian problem."

Tracking the Holocaust

Fifty years ago, this freight car transported Jews to their deaths. Today, it is on display at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem. This exhibit was designed by architect Moshe Safdie.

Cash required for Jewish rescue

Rescuing Jews from unstable countries and bringing them to Israel is the prime priority of Keren Hayesod (KH), according to Moshe Gur, the organization's Director General.

Keren Hayesod raises funds around the world for the Jewish Agency, which oversees rescue and resettlement operations and finances many non-profit programs in Israel. KH is active in 50 countries, including Canada, Singapore, Hong Kong and Japan. In Toronto, Jewish Agency funding is provided by United Jewish Appeal.

Up to 80,000 immigrants - mostly from the former Soviet Union - will land in Israel this year. "It's a mammoth task to arrange for their departure and absorb them," said Gur. "However, we have to do it today before it's too late." In Russia and its neighbouring republics, Jews still face anti-Semitism, economic instability and political uncertainty.

Gur briefed Federation/UJA professionals last week on the Jewish Agency cash crisis, which, he said, makes annual campaign contributions even more urgent. The Agency recently adopted a restructuring plan to avoid a $700 million deficit by the year 2000. Through a combination of budget cutting and additional worldwide fundraising, the Agency hopes to break even within the next five years.

Under the organizational renovations, the Israeli government will take over Youth Aliya - the program providing education and other assistance to immigrant children and youngsters from disadvantaged homes. "There was no choice," noted Gur. "We didn't have enough money to keep Youth Aliya." Gur is heartened, however, by the government's promise that "no child would be left on the streets."

The 100 international KH campaigns are not just a matter of fundraising, said Gur. "It's not only the money but the contacts we are creating with Israel. We share something in common. Our feelings for Israel and our support for Israel."

This woman is on her way home. She is one of 80,000 new immigrants settling in Israel this year.

Students finance Sarajevo computer

By Adi Waksman

The Jewish community of war-ravaged Sarajevo will soon be linked on the Internet with other Jewish communities around the world.

York University's Jewish Student Federation (JSF) is making this hi-tech connection possible with funds raised at a recent Bosnia-aid dance. The JSF is financially supported by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (AJJDC), a humanitarian relief agency commonly called the "Joint," will use $4,000 in dance proceeds to purchase a computer for the Jewish community in Sarajevo. Sarajevo's central Jewish organization, La Benevolencija, will match the funds, dollar for dollar. La Benevolencija works with AJJDC to provide food, clothes and medicine, on a non- sectarian basis, to all of Sarajevo's war victims.

Robyn Kestenberg presents AJJDC's Gideon Taylor with a cheque for $4,000 in New York City.

Joint assistant executive director Gideon Taylor expects the computer, which will be housed in the Jewish community's central building, to "help in carrying out welfare activities." He hopes that better communications capabilities will make "what is already a serious operation even more professional and effective."

Ruben Kamhi, a York University student who moved to Toronto from Sarajevo in 1993, came up with the idea of setting up an E-mail address. "One of the biggest problems in Sarajevo was communications with the outside world, so I thought about providing them with a link to other communities," he said.

Ruben already communicates weekly by E-mail with Darko Stancic, a student who keeps him updated on Jewish life in Sarajevo. Stancic relies on a computer at a private business to stay in touch with his Canadian friend.

Zaide's advice leads to life of service

Nathan Hurwich, still one of Toronto's top fundraisers, says "I was born busy."

Words can only go so far to relate the life story of Nathan Hurwich. It's the numbers that really count.

At 86, Hurwich is still an active canvasser for both UJA and the Jewish National Fund. In fact, Hurwich has devoted 55 years of his life to community service, for which he has received numerous awards and widespread recognition.

In 1971, Hurwich was honoured with UJA's Man of the Year award and two years later was recognized again for outstanding community service.

The credo by which Hurwich lives was handed down to him by his grandfather, Matityahu Soloway, one of Toronto's first shochtim (ritual slaughterers who kill animals used for food according to religious law). "Before he left for Israel, my zaide was my teacher and the most important lesson he taught me was to be a mensch...a good Jew," he recalls. Matityahu Soloway was buried on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem.

Hurwich was born in Toronto in 1909. His parents, Ben-Zion and Rachel, were both early Zionists and his father was one of the founding members of the McCaul Street Synagogue.

When he was only 14, his father's illness forced Hurwich to leave Harbord Collegiate for a job to help support his family. He first found work as a cutter for Tip Top Tailors, and after that, in his uncle's dry goods store.

By then, the Depression had struck. After being unemployed for close to 6 months, and "never giving up," Hurwich began selling auto parts out of the back of a truck before borrowing money to start his own business. "I really felt I could do well on my own," he remembers.

And he did. His working days were 15 hours long, leaving him little time to spend with his wife Roey, whom he married at 23, but Mobile Automotive Products thrived for 20 years until he sold the company.

Today, the Finch campus of Associated Hebrew Schools is named after Hurwich and his wife. "I have no children of my own," he explains, "but the education of children has always been close to my heart."

Hurwich, who says he was "always shul minded," has belonged to Beth Tzedec congregation for 67 years and remains an honourary Board member.

One of Hurwich's proudest moments was receiving an honourary doctorate from Bar Ilan University for his fundraising efforts, which began when he founded the university's Toronto chapter.

The years may have sapped some of Hurwich's energy, but certainly not his enthusiasm for United Jewish Appeal. "I support UJA," he stresses, "because in addition to making education a priority, it looks after every aspect of Jewish life."

Hurwich has also been involved with Canadian Jewish Congress on the National Executive and with B'nai Brith Canada.

Toronto Mayor Hall agrees to meet with CJC regularly

TORONTO — Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall has invited Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region representatives to meet with her on a regular basis to discuss issues of mutual concern, including intergroup relations, hate propaganda and affordable housing.

This initiative followed a meeting in the mayor's office with a delegation from Congress headed by region chair Moshe Ronen.

At the meeting, Ellen Cole, Congress' regional community relations chair, gave the mayor a brief history of Congress intergroup activities. She also spoke about concerns regarding hatemongers operating in Toronto.

The mayor agreed the continued presence of such individuals sullies Toronto's image and she outlined some of the steps the mayor's committee on community and race relations has taken to counter the problem.

Rabbi Dow Marmur, chair of the Israel affairs committee of Congress, told the mayor that Congress is approaching Ontario municipalities to encourage them, as part of the Jerusalem 3000 commemoration, to rename streets and/or other locations to mark the 3,000th anniversary of Jerusalem.

Other Congress participants at the meeting included: Cary Green, chair, political liaison committee; Ontario region executive director Manuel Prutschi; Daniel Fine, director, political liaison and international affairs; and Steven Shulman, associate director, community relations. Also present was Janice Dembo, coordinator of the Toronto mayor's committee on community and race relations.

Court throws out suit against The CJN

TORONTO — A $3-million libel lawsuit brought against The Canadian Jewish News by Rabbi David Cooper of Thornhill, Ont., has been dismissed.

The suit sought damages in connection with an article The CJN ran in September 1994, describing B'nai Brith Canada's rental of space at its headquarters to the Association of Independent Rabbis.

A judge of the Ontario Court (General Division) dismissed the action, saying Rabbi Cooper did not serve proper notice under the Libel and Slander Act.

The action was also dismissed for the co-defendants in the case, CJN reporter Ron Csillag; B'nai Brith Canada; BBC executive vice-president Frank Dimant; Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue; and its spiritual leader, Rabbi Joseph Kelman.

The court also ordered Rabbi Cooper to pay costs in the amount of $5,000.

Rift developing between Russians, Israelis: Sharansky

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The "honeymoon" between immigrants from the former Soviet Union and the general Israeli population is over and the country is facing "a tough and not easy moment," Natan Sharansky recently told 800 people at Holy Blossom Temple.

Though there is only nine per cent unemployment among the 650,000 Soviet immigrants, only 25 per cent are working in their own professions, he said.

To counter critics who see the immigrants as criminals and prostitutes, he added that the crime rate among them is lower than in the general population and they have a higher rate of army enlistment.

Wearing his famous white shirt open at the neck, the diminutive dissident elected not to say one word about the new political movement he has founded, Yisrael B'aliya, and instead let flashes of good humor carry the day.

"In the next five or 10 years, we'll have another million Jews in Israel and we'll make life so good, even North American Jews will want to come over," he said.

He opened with a warm tribute to the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Of the present situation in the wake of the assassination, Sharansky said there is a bitter split between those who want peace now and those who want to preserve land for Israel. "There is no more dialogue," he said. "Unfortunately the debate is pushing all other problems to one side."

But Sharansky devoted most of his 80-minute speech to an explanation of the rift between the immigrants and Israelis.

Ironically, he said, many immigrants, despite their separation from Jewish tradition for 70 years, feel that Israel is "not Jewish enough," that children are taught history of the Jews only since establishment of the state in 1948.

Many immigrants also view Israel as "too socialistic," because they want a chance at a good life. "Though Israel was founded as an ideological state, it is no longer one, but its society functions as if it was," he said.

He stressed that the immigrants from the former Soviet Union had had enough of living as non-Jews under Communism, which failed to bring in a new kind of nation.

"They want to feel part of Israel society, but they don't want to put aside their culture."

Aliyah from North African countries and from the former Soviet Union are quite different, he said. Those coming from Morocco and Yemen were relegated to the lower strata of Israeli society and had to wait for their children to claim their rightful place. But the current immigrants "want to compete for the top jobs now."

He said he understood the bitterness this caused in Israelis, citing the case of a woman who served in the army and lost her place as a student in an internationally known music school in Israel to immigrants who excelled in the Russian pieces demanded by newly-appointed Russian professors.

Sharansky was the third speaker in the Gerald Schwartz-Heather Reisman Lecture Series and was introduced by Heather Reisman as "one of the most compelling people of our age."

Others who paid tribute to him were Rabbi Dow Marmur, Israeli Consul General Jehudi Kinar, Associate Rabbi John Moscowitz, and Elliott Jacobson, president of Holy Blossom Temple.

Author tackles thorny issue of child sexual abuse

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The subject of sexual abuse is hardly a usual one in children's fiction. But that is just what Canadian author Carol Matas has tackled in her latest book The Primrose Path (Blizzard, 1995).

Matas has handled difficult subjects bofore. Sworn Enemies dealt with 1840s Russia, when Jewish communities had to choose which boys would be sent to the army.

She is probably best known, however, for her Holocaust books, Lisa and Jasper, the story of two teenagers in Denmark, and Daniel's Story, which was nominated for the Governor General's Award for children's literature.

So why move to this sensitive and controversial topic?

"I started to think about the dual problems of the effect of a charismatic leader on his followers and about child abuse. The more you think about it, the more you see it," she said in a recent interview with The CJN.

While The Primrose Path bears incontrovertible similarities to a Winnipeg case that got national attention, Matas insists that it is actually based on a number of such stories, including the events at Mount Cashel, and the case of a prominent gynecologist in the Winnipeg Ukrainian community.

Still, Matas insists, the book is a work of fiction.

Debbie, a teenager from a somewhat troubled, non-observant home, is sent to an Orthodox school that is known for its strong educational standards. It is led by Rabbi Werner, who, she discovers, is extremely popular, not just with the students, but their parents as well.

While the Orthodox environment appears strange to her at first, she soon settles in, makes new friends and even establishes a friendly relationship with Rabbi Werner.

She is shocked when the rabbi becomes too friendly — fondling, tickling and kissing the girls.

When she tries to object, she finds that she is not believed. Even when others, including some mothers, come forward to complain about his behavior, most of his supporters believe in his innocence.

This is what a charismatic leader can do, Matas said. "They put on one face to the community — brilliant, warm, loving. The other face is what really happens. It's all about hypocrisy."

A subplot in the book is the family's moving towards Orthodoxy. Because Debbie is a newcomer, an outsider in this community, Matas says, she can see things clearer.

"She can see the irony. An Orthodox man is not supposed to touch a female over three. Yet the rabbi is doing these things that no other man would, and it's OK for him. There's an extra level of confusion in this environment."

The whole issue of peer pressure enters into the picture as well. "Debbie knows what's right — until what everyone thinks is right (the rabbi's fondling) she realizes is wrong."

Matas says she felt it would be hypocritical to set the book anyplace but in a Jewish environment. "I'm Jewish. If I'm going to write about a charismatic, abusive leader and set it somewhere else, [it would be like saying that] it only happens in other communities, that it doesn't happen to us.

"It's saying to kids who are victims don't talk, don't say anything — it's unacceptable."

As long as we deny that such things happen, they will go on, Matas says flatly.

"The only way we will be stronger is to bring it out into the open."

Boundaries of behavior explored in book on Spain

Erna Paris

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Award-winning journalist, author and radio commentator Erna Paris has examined a maze of historical documentation and evolved a theory on how racist doctrine and evil forces can destroy a tolerant society.

Her recently published book, The End of Days: A Story of Tolerance, Tyranny and the Expulsion of the Jews From Spain (Lester Publishing Ltd.), questions how the most extraordinary multicultural society the West had ever known was transformed into a reign of terror for the Jews who had inhabited the area for 1,500 years.

"I think any one of us living in Canada would have felt comfortable in Arab Spain," Paris says. "It was a Golden Age. Why did neighbors later turn on each other?

In her research into the persecution and expulsion of the Jews from Spain, she discovered a striking pattern and similarities to other oppressive regimes.

"Given the right conditions, human beings can be brutalized and conditioned in ways that might previously have been thought impossible. I wondered why."

Paris recalls that she first asked herself the question in her Sunday school class at Holy Blossom Temple. "When I was a teenager, educator Heinz Warschauer played the strangest and scariest record I ever heard. It was the passionate voice of Adolf Hitler at one of his pep rallies. I was stunned."

From that day, Paris began her search for answers to the puzzle of how such things could happen?

Born in Toronto, Paris obtained an Honors BA in philosophy and English at the University of Toronto and went to study French in Paris at the Sorbonne.

In France, she first encountered anti-Semitism. She says several incidents stand out. The words, A mort les Juifs (Death to the Jews) were scrawled in red paint on the walls of the Paris Metro, and a friend's mother asked her why the Jews had killed Christ.

A visit to the Struthof Concentration Camp in the Vosges Mountains, with its gas chamber and dissection table for examining human bodies, "was the turning point in my life," she says.

Supports anti-hate legislation

She questioned the boundaries of human behavior and began to ask if it is possible that there are none.

On her return to Canada several years later, she wrote an article about her experience as the only woman on the jury of a rape trial. It was published in 1969 in the former Canadian magazine. Her second article on priests and nuns who had left the church was published and won a national award. "And that's when I decided I'd try to make it as a writer."

Paris threw herself into writing and broadcasting and won four awards from the Media Club of Canada for feature writing and radio documentary, and other awards.

Paris supports Canadian anti-hate legislation, "because my reading of history suggests to me that liberal societies change for the worse incrementally, not suddenly, and that strategically honed propaganda is a major tool."

In an article titled, Pulling the Threads Together, Paris writes that as soon as it's believed that minorities must integrate into the central ideology of the society in which they live, then that society may find itself in trouble.

Paris recently spoke about The End of Days at Toronto ORTs Arts and Entertainment chapter and she was featured at the Jewish Book Fair.

ELI fund raiser will benefit abused children

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An upcoming fundraiser for the Canada-Israel Association for Child Protection ELI will simultaneously benefit abused children in Israel while delighting local children.

Among the latter will be at least 30 disadvantaged youngsters attending a Dec. 10 Sharon, Lois & Bram concert featuring tunes from their new album Let's Dance.

The $50 ticket price for preferred seats at the O'Keefe Centre performance includes loot bags and a meet-and-greet session following the show.

The Toronto-based organization which purchased a block of preferred seats was established last year after Fran Goldman, conductor of the Toronto Intergenerational Choir for the Toronto Board of Education, learned about ELI on a trip to Israel.

"How could I possibly turn my back on this organization?" Goldman remembers thinking.

In other child-related charities, such as those benefiting physically disabled children, the parents generally form a strong advocacy group, notes Ronni Mandell, 28, a member of the Canadian group's junior board, which is organizing the fundraiser. With abused children, the parents are often the perpetrators, she points out.

Sharon, Lois & Bram

ELI, a non-profit organization based in Tel Aviv, was founded on a shoestring in 1979 by Prof. Hanita Zimrin, a social worker who had written her PhD thesis on "maltreatment of children." The term child abuse had yet to become known and was considered a non-issue in the Jewish community.

Since that time ELI has grown to include an Israel-wide hotline serving both children and perpetrators, a library and clearing house for information on child abuse and a shelter for children at risk.

Hanita Zimrin

With an annual budget of $1.25 million (US), $300,000 of which is provided by the Israeli Ministry of Welfare, ELI has 50 paid employees and some two dozen professional volunteers. Last year they reached 93,000 Israeli schoolchildren in their longstanding public education campaign. Of those, 1.5 per cent turned to the organization for help.

ELI offers intensive therapy to abusers, abused children and their families. Although such therapy, aimed at "putting a family on the track of a normal life," costs about $5,000 (US), research over the past 30 years indicates that eventual hospital, special education and court costs attributed to forgoing therapy can be 20 times that amount, said Zimrin at a recent Toronto meeting of ELI supporters.

The money raised from the Sharon, Lois and Bram concert will be used for therapy, she said.

Coincidentally, Zimrin, who has acted as a consultant on an international basis, has been approached by UNICEF to share her knowledge. Sharon, Lois and Bram were recently named official spokespersons for UNICEF Canada's 50th anniversary celebrations in 1996.

The award-winning children's entertainers have been associated with numerous charities that help children, Lois Lilienstein told The CJN. They are not unfamiliar with organizations helping children and Israel, she added, noting that she, Bram and Sharon are all Jewish. A couple of years ago, the group was named Spiritual Parents of the Year by Na'amat.

To purchase tickets or sponsor a disadvantaged child, call 416-872-2262 and refer to ELI. For information about the organization, call 416-488-0276.

Christian candidate proud of his Jewish heritage

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Peter Kaufmann is a Christian who is proud of his Jewish heritage.

It hurt him, says the unsuccessful mayoralty candidate, when the question of his Jewish ancestry was raised during Winnipeg's recent civic election campaign.

"It hurts to think that that stuff still goes on," he says. "I thought we had put it behind us. One lady I ran into insisted I was lying about not being Jewish. One councillor suggested that I emphasise my Christian faith on my campaign literature, but I believe it is what is in your mind that should count, not your ethnic or religious background.

A grocer and former city councillor (1989-92), Kaufmann started the race as a long shot. By waging a high-profile campaign, with an approach reflecting that of Ontario Premier Mike Harris, he finished a surprisingly strong second to incumbent Mayor Susan Thompson

The Danish-born Kaufmann can trace his Jewish ancestry back to 1750. After his Jewish paternal grandparents separated, his grandmother remarried a non-Jew and his father was baptized at the age of 12.

Kaufmann notes that it was mainly older people who asked about his ethnic background.

"Race relations are more than the color of a person's skin," he observes. "There are times if your name is not Scottish, Irish or English, if your name is Ukrainian, for example, that some people think you should not aspire to certain things."

Kaufmann vowed to have another run at the mayoralty next time around.

"This was a dry run," he says. "I have a team of volunteers in place, about 400 donors and a better understanding of the process."

The outgoing city council numbered one Jewish member, Sandy Hyman, among its 15 councillors. The two-term social worker was one of three sitting councillors to go down to defeat on election night. She represented the heavily Jewish River Heights ward, but lost to businessman Garth Steek who ran an aggressive campaign built around a right-wing platform.

הרדוף :

כמה אנשים בקנדה קוראים עברית? שאלה קשה. יש כאן כמובן מספר בלתי ידוע של ישראלים אך יהודים קנדיים רבים שהו בארץ תקופות שונות וקוראים עברית. קחו לדוגמא את דויד הרדוף, סופר, מילונאי ומוכר ספרים, שהוא מחברם של יותר משלושים ספרים בנושאי יהדות, תנ"ך, מדרש וספרות עברית. תרומתו של הרדוף נישאת כמובן הרחק מעבר לקנדה, ואף זיכתה אותו בפרסים חשובים כגון זה של אוניברסיטת בר אילן. הרדוף הוא יוזמו של מילון חדש, שמופיע בחלקים זה מספר שנים. והו מילון Transliterated בעברית ואנגלית. זה עתה הופיע הכרך השלישי שנושא את האותיות H-K. הטקסט ערוך בטוב טעם וכל מושג מוסבר הן בעברית והן באנגלית, תוך הבאת דוגמא ממקורות עבריים או מסופר ידוע. לדוגמא למדתי ש - kangaroo court (בית משפט קנגרו) פירושו בית משפט חסר סמכות, או כדברי הרדוף "בית משפָּח" . למדתי גם שקאשע היא דייסת דגן באידיש (סליחה, הורי לא האכילו אותי באידיש). ולהסברת שם התואר keen (חריף) מצטט הרדוף את רש"י: "תרנגולים של בית בוריא בקיאים וחריפים, ואין מניחים תרנגל נכרי ביניהם". אין מה להגיד - קריאה מענגת. יישר כוח!לכל המעוניינים במילון או בשאר פעילותו הברוכה של הרדוף, טל:416-663-5467

הכותרת המוזרה הזו אינה המצאה שלי. זהו שמו של ספר שקראתי בחודשים האחרונים לאחר שתורגם לעברית. קראתי אותו לאט כי פחדתי שיגמר עלי מהר מידי. פשוט רציתי להאריך את העונג ככל שאפשר. זהו ספרו של הפסיכיאטר האמריקני הנודע ארווין יָלום, על המפגש בין הפילוסוף הגרמני פרידריך ניטשה ("כה אמר זאראתוסתרא") לבין הרופא היהודי - הוינאי יוזף ברוייר, שהתבקש לעזור לניטשה בבעיותיו הרפואיות הסבוכות. רוב הספר, אם כך, הוא למעשה תוכן שיחותיהם של השניים. אבל הנושא האמיתי של הספר הוא לידת הפסיכותראפיה, הרי היא הטכניקה שמקובלת כל כך כיום לטיפול באנשים. לאורך כל הספר מופיע ניטשה כאדם קשה, שכלתני, מנותק מהרגש, עקב חיין הקשים. רק לקראת הסוף, כשמצליח תהליך הפסיכותראפיה, הוא נפתח ומסוגל אפילו להזיל דמעה, ומכאן הכותרת המוזרה לכאורה של הנובאלה הזו. הספר הראשון בעניין פסיכותראפיה נכתב על ידי ברוייר ופרויד בסוף המאה שעברה. ואכן זיגמונד פרויד היה סטודנט לרפואה וידידו הטוב של ברוייר בשנת התרחשות הספר (1882), והוא דמות מרכזית בספר "כשניטשה בכה". לכאורה - כל מה שכתבתי כאן עשוי להתקבל כמשעמם ומשמים, אך זה אחד הספרים המרתקים ביותר שקראתי בחיי ובודאי אחד הטובים שבהם. זה ספר שיילך איתכם הרבה שנים ואולי יישאר.

רק ישראלי יבין :

שלוש אימהות מתוֹכחות ביניהן "מתי מתחילים החיים". אומרת הקאתולית:"זה ברור שהחיים מתחילים ברגע ההפריה!" אומרת הפרוטסטנטית: "אל תגזימי, החיים מתחילים כשהתינוק נולד!" מקשיבה האמא היהודית ואומרת: "מה אתן יודעות! החיים האמיתיים מתחילים כשהבן שלך מתקבל לבית הספר לרפואה!"

Programmer tries to interest young Atlantic Jews

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — When everyone else speaks, Yakov Feig listens. And the Atlantic region benefits.

Feig is the programmer appointed last July by the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) to develop Jewish interest among children, teens and university students.

Since his appointment, he has spent considerable time listening to what young people want and responding with programming that has attracted a great deal of attention.

Working with the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation, the Ottawa-born Feig has offered programs at Dalhousie University that attracted over 50 students (of 110) in what he termed a remarkable percentage.

At the University of New Brunswick in Fredericton, half of 20 students on his list turned out for an event. A falafel night in Moncton drew 12 of 30 youngsters between 10 and 18 years of age.

"That doesn't frustrate me. I know we'll never draw 30 of 30 because there are some who will never come, no matter what, and some who have other plans. We just have to keep working to get the numbers up."

At the National Capital region, where Feig was director of the Jewish Students Union-Hillel for Ottawa and Carleton universities, about one-third of his list of 275 students attended social events, and possibly 50 to 75 attended cultural events. Feig said the norm in Montreal or Toronto is about 10 per cent attendance.

He said his goal in Halifax is to have one program per month for each of three groups — grades 3 to 6; 7 to 9; and 10 to 12 — and at least one program a month outside Halifax.

"The people here are warm and friendly and have given me a level where I can operate as an individual," said Feig, a graduate of Carleton with a Bachelor of Public Administration.

"For each person, there is a different reason to be Jewish," he said. "For some it is the Holocaust, for others Jewish food that brings back memories of home and for others just the social impact of getting together with other Jewish students."

He said the programs for younger children and teens have to be professional. "They are affected by so many outside influences like school, sports, movies, extracurricular activities, that they aren't ready to accept second-rate programming. You can't put anything over on them."

Yakov Feig

Feig is "doing well," said Jon Goldberg, executive director of the AJC. "The first six months are the most difficult. He has to meet the leaders and people of the communities and find out what will work best. We're pleased with the initial reaction to Yakov and look forward to having him with us for quite some time."

Feig, son of a Holocaust survivor, attended Hebrew University for a year, and was youth director of Beth Sholom West Synagogue in Ottawa and vice-president of the Jewish Student Union at Carleton. Following graduation, he worked at the national office of the Canadian Red Cross.

CFTAU ANNUAL MEETING

Lawrence Bessner of Montreal (2nd from left) was re-elected national president of the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University at the organization's recent annual meeting in Ottawa. Joining him were (l-r) Montreal chapter president Gerald Soiferman, Ottawa president Arnell Goldberg, Montreal immediate past president Sue Carol Isaacson, Montreal chair of the executive committee Myer Bick and Toronto president Marty Goldberg.

Nili's baskets say it all

With the help of Baskets n' Stuf you can say "happy birthday", welcome a new baby, wish someone a speedy recovery or celebrate a special annivesary.

Nili, the owner of Baskets n' Stuf, located at 6237 Bathurst St. at Steeles, says she specializes in creating unique and elegant baskets that are designed exclusively for the recipient.

Nili, who has been in business at that location for 6 years, says that holidays are a popular time to send baskets to family and friends. Baskets are created for every type of person and for every occasion, such as births, get well, gourmet food, fresh fruit baskets, and many more. As well, the store is licensed to include wine and liquor in the baskets, for celebrating those special occasions.

In order to create a tailor-made basket, all that is required is a little bit of information about the recipient. Customers can drop in or give a call to the store and order something specific to the tastes of the person in mind.

As well as individual baskets, Nili also caters to corporations. If an employer would like to send gift or holiday baskets to staff, clients or associates, baskets can be filled with treats of his or her choice. The individual tastes and budget are all that is needed to create a unique basket, which if needed, can be delivered anywhere in Canada and the United States.

Customized menus at Malmar

Malmar and Tastefully Yours has opened its new kitchens at 45 Brisbane Rd., Unit #17 (416) 667-0780. Tastefully Yours will supply all your needs from a houseful of guests to an individual dish, offering the same imaginative cuisine and excellent service you've come to expect from them.

The Schaffers specialize in both social and corporate catering, along with catering to your individual needs.

They are glad to advise clients on the variety of different foods available. Each menu is customized to reflect the taste of the client, and uses only the best and freshest of ingredients. Malmar can supply everything: staff, food, tableware, even rentals such as chairs, tables or if needed, a tent for outdoor functions.

"You will be proud to serve our food because of its quality, freshness and presentation," Deanna Schaffer promises.

For those with special health needs, such as low-fat, low salt, dietetic or vegetarian diets, Malmar will make foods to your special order.

Some people use this service to stock the freezers of their elderly parents or children away at university, who find it difficult to prepare nutritious healthy and appetizing meals for themselves, Deanna explains.

A Product of Quality ... A Respect for Tradition ...

More than just a logo, this truly is the meaning behind every Chai Kosher Poultry product. Now into its 8th year in operation, this family owned and operated plant knows of the quality consumers want and entail strict and supervised procedures to provide it..

Under the direct supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR), its staff of 57 includes 4 schochtim (slaughterers) and 3 mashgichim (Kashruth supervisors). As well, poultry prepared under Lubavitch auspices also comes from Chai Kosher.

Chai in Quality ...

Being the only kosher processing plant in Ontario, Chai provides over 6,000 birds a day to the kosher market across Canada.

The diligent and caring staff, from the schochtim to the packagers, with the watchful eyes of both the veterinarian staff of the Federal Government and the highly trained mashgichim of the COR, ensure that only the best in kosher reach each table.

Chai in Taste ...

The entire kosher process provides a tastier product. Only ice cold water is used during the processing of the birds as opposed to scalding hot water used in non-kosher entities. This ice cold water seals in the natural juices and tenderness of the birds, whereas the hot water boils most of it out. For further koshering, the birds are soaked for a minimum of 32 minutes, salted for 1 hour and again soaked in ice cold water for 30 minutes to rinse off the excess salt. The process, with the dual supervision, ensures that these poultry products are 100% kosher, all year round, including Passover.

Chai in Style ...

From a single package of legs or breasts, to a family pack of wings and drumsticks, Chai has it all. As well, cornish hens, stewing hens and even ducks can be found in many locations sealed with the Chai label. Products such as turkey scallopini, turkey and chicken stir-fry, turkey roasts, and most recently, ground dark and white chicken and turkey has also been added to the Chai line.

Chai delivers daily to neighbourhood chain stores, including Perl's Meats, Sunnybrook, Miracle Food Mart, Food City, Loblaws, Highland Farms, Super Centre, Price Chopper and No Frills. Many kosher butcher shops, including Hartman's, Kosher Meats and Treats, Hamilton Kosher in Hamilton, United Kosher in Ottawa and Aviv Kosher Meats in Vancouver, also carry Chai products.

Chai to You ...

Currently, with health conscious consumers turning frequently to healthy, low-fat food, it is comforting to know that those who keep kosher can also get high quality, conveniently packaged poultry, prepared under the highest standarfds of kashruth and cleanliness.

Sam Firestone Caterers' files bulging with thank-you notes

Apart from planning and serving the delicious kosher meals for which Sam Firestone Caterers has become famous, Les Firestone, executive chef Jimmy Lyras and staff probably spend more time reading "fan mail" than any other single activity.

While they're "no rival to the Beatles in the fan mail department," acknowledges Les, their culinary creations are obviously music to their customers' palates. In addition to the numerous unsolicited letters of praise from their satisfied clientele, Firestone also maintains a large file of questionnaires completed by their customers. These questionnaires, issued by Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue as a way of monitoring customer satisfaction, ask clients to rate the religious service, the catering, and the janitorial service. Almost invariably, they come back with glowing reports on all three departments, and often include the kind of poignant remarks usually reserved for a friend. To his customers, Les Firestone is.

"Service has become a cliché in the catering industry," he says, "but we really do bend over backward to make people happy." Proving his point, at each function Les stays on the premises until the very last customer has left. "I want to experience everything first-hand, and personally respond to any requests," he says. "What does "personal service" mean if you're not there to personally serve?" The bottom line, though, is that he does it "because I love it."

If Firestone is the "mover", then executive chef Jimmy Lyras is certainly the "shaker" in the Firestone kitchen. Lyras has all the qualities you'd want in a head chef. His knowledge of cuisine spans the culinary globe, and his creative flair is legendary – yet he's extremely down-to-earth, easy to work with, and receptive to customers' ideas.

A perusal of a recent party menu bears ample testimony to his abilities and the zesty, innovative dishes that have kept Sam Firestone in the forefront of kosher cuisine in Toronto. Grilled vegetable salads with balsamic vinaigrette; mushroom caps filled with roast peppers and zucchini; a sundried tomato and leek strudel; an orange and grapefruit salad with poppyseed dressing; a roasted corn and black bean salad with a spicy lime vinaigrette . . . for starters. Imagine the party-goers' delight when they got to Jimmy's new Mediterranean chicken, the details of which cannot be revealed here because the recipe is more closely guarded than Fort Knox!

Functions for 50 guests or more are catered in one of the synagogue's three banquet rooms. Members and non-members alike can avail themselves of the services, and many prefer the intimacy and familiarity of this traditional synagogue setting to other alternatives.

Sam Firestone Caterers adheres to the highest standards of kashruth, under the supervision of the kashruth council of Toronto (C.O.R.). A full-time mashgiach is on the premises at all times.

"Our goal is to make our customers one hundred percent happy," says Les. "Ninety-nine percent isn't good enough."

A lofty goal — but one that, more often than not, Firestone has the satisfaction of achieving and savouring in the wee hours of the morning, after the last guest has departed.

Miracle Means Fresh and Miracle Means Kosher!

Miracle Food Mart and Ultra-Mart are gearing up for Hanukkah with a full assortment of kosher and holiday products.

Bill Sheine, vice-president of marketing for the parent company, The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company (A&P), says that Miracle Food Mart was the first supermarket chain in Ontario to sell kosher meat and the tradition continues with fresh, high quality kosher meat and specialty products. "We've always tried to meet the needs of our kosher customers."

Finest quality and selection of kosher meat

All glatt kosher fresh beef, fresh veal and fresh lamb sold by Miracle and Ultra-Mart comes from Agri Processors in Iowa. The large cuts of meat are cut to specification at Lazar Yitzchok, a federally approved glatt processing facility. It is inspected and approved by the Kashruth council of Toronto (COR 369).

Miracle's Glatt kosher meats are cut fresh under the supervision of a Mashgiach and sent daily to Miracle and Ultra-Mart stores at Viewmount & Bathurst, Bathurst & Steeles, Sheppard & Bathurst, and Don Mills & Steeles. Staff is always pleased to take personal orders for that special roast for the holidays or any other special cut desired. Ken Duff, now the seafood director, but previously assistant director of meats says that "Iowa beef costs more but we are willing to give the customers what they want."

Kosher poultry available in a variety of cuts

Kosher poultry, fresh daily under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR 218) is available at the same stores in a wide variety and selection of quality poultry cuts prepared under the strictest standards of Kashruth and cleanliness. "Freshness is one of the things that differentiates us from the competition. Our motto is 'Miracle means fresh'."

This motto also applies to the Miracle and Ultra-Mart produce sections, with counter after counter of fresh domestic as well as imported fruits and vegetables. From the tropics come ugli fruit, plantain bananas, pineapples,

Fresh produce from the everyday to the exotic

mangoes and coconuts. Cactus pears are a treat flown in from South Africa, and from Italy come delicious blood oranges. With apple varieties such as Mutsu, Royal Gala, Granny Smith, Delicious and McIntosh, there is sure to be one to suit the apple afficionado. "We have our own produce buyers in each region from which we buy and they work primarily at the fields. With 1100 stores across North America, we have major buying power and we purchase entire fields in order to handle our requirements," says Sheine.

Master Choice line sets new standard of excellence

Introduced four years ago, the in-house Master Choice line includes a plethora of premium quality products guaranteed to excite buyers who want the very best. The line includes a large number of kosher products such as soft drinks, chips, cookies, and sorbet-ice creams. Master Choice is sold by all A&P supermarkets in both the United States and Canada, and by Miracle, Ultra-Mart and Dominion Stores in Canada.

The people at Miracle Food Mart know that quick, kosher meals are a requirement for the busy working family and it offers prepared foods such as Chai frozen barbeque chickens, Empire pizzas, a wide range of Tabachnik soups, Perl's meat pies, Aaron's cold cuts, and Israeli packaged seafood specialty items. Even salad and stir fries are a snap with precut shredded carrots, broccoli slaw, garden salad or broccoli pieces.

Sheine says that "maintaining a loyal customer base is of utmost importance to us, and earning that loyalty depends on how well you satisfy the needs of customers. Everybody wants a piece of the grocery business but they can't compete with us on variety, freshness and service."

Count on Miracle and Ultra-Mart for all your Kosher Needs

Israeli educator links Jewish identity to collective memory

By RICHARD STOLL
Special to The CJN

COLLINGWOOD — "The great binder of Jewish identity is 'collective memory,' not 'critical history,' " Prof. Ze'ev Mankowitz told those attending the 12th annual Board of Jewish Education (BJE) Fall Conference for administrators and principals, held this year at the Blue Mountain Resort in Collingwood, Ont.

Mankowitz, currently the director of the Melton Centre for Jewish Education in the Diaspora at Hebrew University, served as scholar-in-residence at the recent three-day conference.

In a series of four lectures entitled Memory, Identity and Education, Mankowitz developed the idea that there is very little that history can offer to students if it is simply analyzed in terms of dates, cause and effect and relativity.

"Although we can certainly learn from the past, history doesn't really teach us anything" definite. In fact, "the same historical event can induce very opposite conclusions," Mankowitz said.

Rather, he said, "we learn about history in terms of our values." Consequently, a far more effective approach for fostering a positive Jewish identity in our students is through "collective memory," which would include poetry, ritual, classical texts, telling the stories that have shaped the collective consciousness of the Jewish nation, he explained.

Mankowitz also examined the pressures of the modern period and how modernity placed the Jewish people in an unprecedented historical position, which in turn, created a crisis for Jewish identity.

He said we are now, in fact, living "in a period of 'post-modernity.'

"While the goal of the past was making Jewish people modern, there has been a major shift today to making modern people Jewish," Mankowitz concluded.

Each year, the conference pays tribute to any administrator or principal retiring at the end of that academic year. This year's honoree was Arthur Tannenbaum, former executive director and current executive vice-president of the Associated Hebrew Schools (AHS).

Tannenbaum, retiring after 22 years, was honored by many of his colleagues at a special melaveh malka program. Those paying tribute to Tannenbaum included Jerry Rosenfield, principal, Junior High division, AHS; Bernard Shoub, finance director, BJE; Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director, BJE; and Rabbi Abraham Soffer, educational director, AHS.

Co-chairs for the event were Rhona Birenbaum (Leo Baeck Day School), Herb Spindel (Richmond Hill Hebrew School) and Rosenfield.

Arthur Tannenbaum (right), executive vice-president of Associated Hebrew Schools in Toronto, is congratulated by Ze'ev Mankowitz, director of the Melton Centre at Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Tannenbaum will be retiring in 1996.

Scholar to discuss government lobbying

TORONTO — Jerusalemite David Morrison will be scholar-in-residence at this year's Kehillat Shaarei Torah Shabbes in Shul program, to be held Dec. 8 and 9.

Morrison, a psychiatrist who made aliyah from the United States, will speak about the issues surrounding Jewish lobbying of governments, and how, according to Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, "some Jewish organizations can't see beyond their own agendas to do what's right for klal Israel."

Morrison has recently published Heroes, Antiheroes and the Holocaust; American Jewry and Historical Choice, (Milah Press), which discusses American Jewish efforts to influence the U.S. government during World War II. His research will form the background for the program.

He will speak on Friday night at the rabbi's home, and several times on Shabbat at the synagogue.

Rabbi Tradburks explained that Shabbes in Shul is held on the shortest Shabbat of the year. Participants stay in shul, alternating between davening, programs and meals.

Kehillat Shaarei Torah is at 2640 Bayview Ave. in Willowdale. For more information, call 416-229-2600.

Featured Speaker:
Dr. Stephen P. Cohen
"What Rabin Meant for Israel"

Dr. Cohen, Director of the Institute for Middle East Peace and Development in Montreal, knew and worked closely with Prime Minister Rabin behind the scenes for the past 15 years. He will reflect on the man and his meaning for Israel and World Jewry.

We hope that all who support ARZA CANADA's commitment to a progressive Israel will join together for this evening of mourning and memory. In so doing, we will rededicate ourselves to achieving in our time that for which Yitzhak Rabin gave his life: Israel's security and enduring peace.

Rabin's 'presence' permeated GA

By DANA DEMB
Special to The CJN

BOSTON — Bo l'chyot b'yachad — "Come let's be together." The words of David Broza's song resounded in the huge hall on the opening night of the recent 36th General Assembly (GA) of Jewish Federations in Boston.

Over 4,000 Jewish community leaders, rabbis, artists, students educators and journalists met to share information, to discuss the impact of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, to affirm Jewish unity, to schmooze and to learn about what's going on in Jewish communities all over the world.

The first evening of the conference evoked conflicting sentiments. It was scheduled as a centennial commemoration of federation involvement in the Jewish community but was adapted to include a tribute to the fallen prime minister.

The tribute included a video montage of Rabin, with clips from the days of the Palmach and the unification of Jerusalem after the Six Day War. I enviously watched the representations of the heroism of old, wishing I could have joined the Palmach and been part of that great adventure of building and defending the young Jewish homeland. But watching the clips of young Rabin in uniform entering the Old City allowed me to witness this historical victory. It was as close as I could get to being there and it made me proud.

Eiten Haber, director general of the Office of the Prime Minister, spoke about his relationship with Rabin. Then the audience recited Tehillim.

After the memorial, the evening returned to its original schedule, with Jewish performers celebrating our culture. They seemed to be saying, "Look how far we've come in America."

Joel Grey performed a medley of Yiddish ditties and Rosemary Clooney sang Gershwin.

One by one, the performers shared feelings of nostalgia for the good old days on the Lower East Side, where everyone knew the words to Bei Mir Bist Du Sheyn. The Jewish humor, songs and cultural memories established a bond with a departed Jewish past.

Then Broza took the stage. The popular Israeli troubador sang Yihiyeh Tov — It Will Be Good, a song I'd heard a thousand times before. Broza composed this song in honor of Anwar al-Sadat's visit to Jerusalem. I grew up with Yihiyeh Tov at campfires in Habonim. It was part of my Zionist education, my Israeli dream — the Israeli singer sharing his vision of peace.

Broza writes new verses at every stage of the peace process — too many, he says, to sing at once. I can remember only the first line of the verse he added Wednesday night — Bo l'chyot b'yachad — "Come (let's) be together." He could have been referring to Israelis and Arabs, but what I heard that night was a call for mutual understanding between Jews — come let's live together.

The evening had been mixed, the tribute to Rabin followed by the celebration of North American Jewish life. But suddenly, listening to Bo l'chyot b'yachad, it all came together. Rabin's early years and the klezmer music both represented a nostalgia, a homage to a period that is gone. The black and white images of tanks rolling through the Negev and the Yiddish songs both made the audience proud to be Jewish, proud to own a shared history. The film clips of Rabin's handshakes with Yaser Arafat and King Hussein and the fresh lyrics of Yihiyeh Tov reminded us of our collective future.

The evening led us from the closing of a tumultuous period in our history to a new era, one full of uncertainty and hope.

Dana Demb studies Middle Eastern and Jewish Studies at McGill University and participated in the Do the Write Thing program at the GA.

We're still #1 in all of Canada

Over the next few months and years all of Canada will be going through a major renovation. But what do politics have to do with Taps?

Well, aside from loving Canada the way most Canadians do, we'd like to keep Canada together because it's good for our business. And although we have only one store – right here in Toronto – we ship from coast to coast. In fact, we have customers from Halifax to Montreal to Vancouver that actually come to Toronto just to visit our showroom.

Perhaps it's because there is no other bath showroom in Canada like Taps with such a large selection of fixtures, tiles and accessories... at prices that attract about-to-be bathroom renovators from near and far.

The renovation of Canada may seem like a big hurdle now and will no doubt present us with many challenges. But in the end, like all the other renovations we've seen, the result will be well worth it. Let's work together.

'Big M' helps open rink in Metulla's Canada Centre

In addition to visiting Nazareth, Bethlehem, the Sea of Galilee and Jerusalem, the Mahovliches toured Masada and enjoyed a mud bath and a dunk in the Dead Sea.

Along with the UIA group, known as Hineni, they were briefed on Mideast peace efforts by Yitzhak Rabin only weeks before the prime minister was assassinated.

Then-foreign minister Shimon Peres spoke to the group at a breakfast meeting as well.

The Mahovliches also toured the Golan Heights, met Canadian peacekeepers and visited with settlers living in Israel below the Heights.

They got a taste of what life is like in the Israeli pressure cooker. During their visit to Metulla, "you could hear gunfire back and forth" in the distance, Mahovlich said.

Accompanied by two Israeli Defence Force helicopters that hovered overhead, they were part of a group that crossed into Lebanon to visit a radio station.

Marie said the trip showed her "how very difficult things are for these people." But "it was a thoroughly enjoyable trip and I'd love to go back. It was a learning experience."

The Hineni mission was the group's first visit to Israel in eight years, said Steve Ain, executive vice-president of UIA Canada. Its purpose was to show significant contributors how their money is spent, as well as to allow them to participate in the opening ceremonies at Canada Centre.

"Metulla is the flagship project of UIA Canada," Ain said.

The Drevnigs donated $1 million (US) towards construction of the new Olympic-sized rink, which supplements a much smaller rink that has proven extremely popular in past years, he added.

Ain predicted that Metulla and the surrounding northern communities will continue to enjoy the economic benefits generated by thousands of visitors to Canada Centre.

At the opening ceremony, 200 kids from the surrounding area took to the ice and "they couldn't get them off. You looked around and said, this is why we did it. It gave a context to the whole project," Ain said.

During a recent visit to Toronto, Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg told The CJN the total cost of the project has hit $6 million (US). The initial projection was for a $3-million facility but the lowest bid from contractors came in at $5 million. Inflation and other costs pushed the final tally to $6 million.

In addition to the $1 million provided by the Drevnigs, the municipality of Metulla provided $1.5 million and $2 million more was borrowed. That means he is searching for a further $1.5 million "to finish," Goldberg said.

"I need to find a way to support it. We will find a way to do it. But everyone in the country talks about the project changing the life of the area. People from all over Israel come for a weekend in the north," Goldberg said.

Goldberg predicted the arena will pay for itself, as did the previous, smaller rink.

Canada Centre will offer thousands of kids lessons in skating, figure skating, hockey and short track speed skating, the mayor added, and their membership and user fees will help pay for the rink.

Boris Drabkin, a speedskating coach from the former Soviet Union; Boris Mindel, who played professional hockey in Russia 20 years ago for Ska-Nova Sibirska; and Canadian Jeff Budd all provide on-ice skating instruction, said Yakov Schneider, general director of Canada Centre.

With the new rink, which seats 1,000 (plus 1,500 standing room), Israel has already booked its first international figure skating competition. From Dec. 17 to 21, Canada Centre will host Skate Israel, with local star Michael "Misha" Shmerkin carrying Israel's medal hopes. Shmerkin recently finished second at Skate Canada in Saint John, N.B.

Seventy skaters from 24 countries are expected to attend the inaugural Skate Israel event, Schneider said.

Looking further into the future, Goldberg said Canada Centre will host the newly added hockey competition at the next Maccabiah Games in 1997. It will also be available for figure skating.

New group of politicians named to Israeli cabinet

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli political life jumped a generation last week when Prime Minister Shimon Peres appointed two relatively young ministers to top posts in his cabinet.

Ehud Barak, 53, the former Israel Defence Force chief of staff, is to be foreign minister in the new government, and Haim Ramon, 45, will serve as minister of interior.

Peres' new government was overwhelmingly approved by the Knesset last Wednesday. At the same time, Peres was sworn in as Israel's 12th prime minister.

The final vote was 62-8, with 38 abstentions. Most of the opposition abstained in the vote, with the exception of Moledet, Tsomet and a number of other opposition Knesset members.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu stressed prior to the vote that the abstention was to underscore the party's faith in democracy, but that he remained opposed to the new government's policies.

While much of the cabinet makeup is the same, one completely new face is Rabbi Yehuda Amital, head of the Har Etzion Yeshiva at Alon Shvut near Bethlehem, in the West Bank, and leader of the moderate-Orthodox movement, Meimad.

Meimad, which unsuccessfully ran for the Knesset in the past, supports territorial concessions.

Peres' decision to reach out to Amital was seen as an effort to include Orthodox Israelis in the wake of deep secular-religious divisions, especially since the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

Amital is to be a minister without portfolio. His responsibilities will include maintaining the government's dialogue with the settlers and with Jewish communities in the Diaspora.

As for Barak and Ramon, both will be members of the "inner cabinet" and will be closely involved in the peace process with the Palestinians and with Syria.

In his speech presenting the cabinet before the Knesset, Peres pledged to continue the peace policies begun by his predecessor, the late Rabin.

Peres will hold the defence post himself, in the tradition of his mentor, David Ben-Gurion, and of Rabin.

Peres surprised and pleased the Labor Party Central Committee last Tuesday night by telling them that talks would continue with the Orthodox parties, with a view to drawing one or more of them into the new government.

"Some may want to help actively, others passively," he said.

The intense and hopeful talks between Labor and the National Religious Party Tuesday triggered a mini-crisis with Labor's leftist-secularist coalition partner, Meretz.

At one point, Yossi Sarid of Meretz lashed out publicly at Labor's Yossi Beilin, minister of economic planning, who is moving to a special ministerial post in the Prime Minister's Office.

Beilin is handling the talks with the religious parties.

The wrath of Meretz eventually subsided after Peres penned a formal assurance that support for any religious legislation in the future would require the consent of all the coalition partners.

The Orthodox parties are pressing for legislation that would counter the effects of a recent High Court of Justice ruling that opens the way for state recognition of non-Orthodox conversions performed in Israel.

Such conversions carried out abroad have long been recognized under Israeli law, after a High Court ruling in 1989. But they have not been permitted in Israel and the Orthodox say they want legislation that would preserve the status quo.

Pending the possible accession of an Orthodox party, the coalition now is made up of three factions: Labor, Meretz and Yi'ud. It also enjoys the consistent support of two largely Arab factions, the Arab Democratic Party and Hadash, giving Peres a total of 63 votes of support in the 120-seat chamber.

Peres' elevation of younger men to prominent positions has come at the expense of several middle-age hopefuls.

Among them are Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, Tourism Minister Uzi Baram, Labor and Welfare Minister Ora Namir, Finance Minister Avraham Shohat and Police Minister Moshe Shahal, all of whom are staying in the cabinet.

Most openly smarting from being passed over was Shahal, who actually threatened to resign and return to his large law practice in Haifa.

He told reporters that he had never really wanted to be police minister in the first place. He was reportedly lobbying hard with Peres for the interior or foreign affairs portfolios.

In the end he made do with what Peres announced to the party as a new "Ministry of Internal Security" that would embrace, according to the prime minister, significantly more responsibilities than just the police.

Assassin's bullets reveal Israeli schisms

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The earthquake that shook Tel Aviv and Eilat last week did not rattle Israel as much as Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, the tremors of which will be felt for years to come.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

When Yigal Amir — a religious nationalist — pumped three bullets into Rabin on Nov. 4, he not only murdered a prime minister, but brought out the deep-seated schisms of Israeli society, reflected in its yawning social, religious and political divisions.

Contrary to the catchy fund-raising slogan, "We are One," Israel is fundamentally a nation of two solitudes, the secular majority and the observant minority.

During the first two decades of Israel's existence, this faultline in its body politic was not problematic. But with the capture of the West Bank (the biblical lands of Judea and Samaria) in the wake of the Six Day War, the cleavages multiplied as nationalism and messianism welled up in the religious community.

As battle lines were drawn, Orthodox Jews in large numbers rallied behind the imperative that Israel must never relinquish the God-given territories, even in exchange for peace with their Arab neighbors.

Among secular Jews, there was no such near unanaminity. Some, for reasons having nothing to do with religion, hewed to the unbending view that Israel must not give up the territories under any circumstances. Still others adopted a pragmatic approach, being amenable to compromise in the interests of reaching a viable accommodation with the Arabs.

Yitzhak Rabin and Israelis from all walks of life who supported his vision of peace exemplified this mindset.

Amir rebelled with every fibre of his being against Rabin's "defeatist" policies. It is clear that he was animated by fanaticism. And it is plain that he was delusional in claiming that he acted "on orders from God."

But for all that, Amir was not unrepresentative of the extreme religious right in Israel, which has become increasingly radical and vocal since the Six Day War. Before Amir appeared on the scene, these extremists produced an anti-Arab underground that was cracked by the government. It also spawned the likes of Baruch Goldstein, the doctor who mowed down 29 Muslims in Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs.

Amir, the son of a respectable Yemenite family, was a Bnei Akiva emissary in Latvia, a Torah scholar whom his teachers at Bar-Ilan University rated highly, and a devotee of the settlers' cause in the West Bank.

Over time, Amir embraced an incendiary concept — the supremacy of Halachah over civil law. We now know that he may have been inspired by the inflammatory teachings of certain extremist rabbis, who have been widely accused of creating a climate of religious intolerance in some yeshivot.

To Amir, Rabin was a rodef (an enemy, in effect, of the Jewish people) who had to be hunted down and killed. Amir was not a crazed individual. Rather, he was cool, chillingly calculating and confident of his rigid beliefs.

As he put it at a court hearing on Nov. 20: "Maybe physically I acted alone, but what pulled the trigger was not only my finger, but the finger of this whole nation, which for 2,000 years yearned for this land and dreamed of it."

Most Israelis, even those who share Amir's basic ideology with regard to Eretz Yisrael, were sickened and appalled by Rabin's assassination. But the mourning over his untimely death cannot disguise the fact that Israel has slid into two camps, with its own values, sensibilities, sense of history and priorities.

The cleavages, however, are not carved in stone. There are Orthodox Jews who manifestly support the Oslo peace process, while there are secular Jews who vehemently oppose it.

But even after this disclaimer is factored into the equation, there can be little doubt that Israel is profoundly fractured along political lines.

And it has always been so.

•In 1933, Haim Arlosoroff — the political secretary of the Jewish Agency and a Mapai loyalist — was murdered. Many claim his assailants were Revisionist Zionists.

•In 1944, under British pressure, the Jewish Agency and the Haganah launched "the season," the anti-Irgun campaign.

•In 1948, Israel teetered on civil war when the Altalena, an Irgun ship carrying arms, was sunk by Israeli soldiers under the command of Yitzhak Rabin.

The new prime minister, Shimon Peres, is painfully aware of the past and of the fissures which beset Israel today. Last week, in an attempt to heal the wounds caused by his predecessor's murder, he appointed a moderate Orthodox rabbi — Yehuda Amital — to the cabinet.

Rabbi Amital's appointment is demonstrably designed to lower the rhetoric and to reduce "the hatred between the religious and the secular," as he himself explained.

It is a tall order, but at least the healing has begun.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 20

• The shekel was devalued by 1.5 per cent against the U.S. dollar. The new exchange rate is 3.098 shekels for one U.S dollar and 2.273 shekels for one Canadian dollar.

Nov. 21

• In presenting the new government to the Labor Party's central committee, Acting Prime Minister Shimon Peres reiterated his commitment to seeking a rapprochement with settlers in the West Bank.

Nov. 22

• One week after President Ezer Weizman asked him to form the next government, Shimon Peres officially received the Knesset's vote of confidence. The vote was 62-8 with 32 abstentions. From the dais of the Knesset, Peres urged Syrian President Hafez al-Assad to join in a comprehensive peace arrangement.

• At 6:15 in the morning an earthquake measuring 6.2 on the Richter scale shook Israel. It was the largest quake felt in Israel since 1927. The hardest shocks were centred in the Eilat area. Damage to property was light. One person however, Yakov Ben Yehuda, 66, died of a heart attack when he attempted to remove his wife from her wheelchair in their hotel. Thirteen other people were injured lightly. The quake was also felt in Egypt where six people died; in Saudi Arabia, where two people died; and in Jordan, where one person died.

Nov. 23

• More aftershocks from yesterday's earthquake were felt in Eilat. They measured 4.5 on the Richter scale.

Nov. 24

• Ha'aretz reported that among the documents found in Iraq by UN inspectors was a proposal to initiate an attack on Israel with biological weapons. The document was a working paper which was submitted to the Iraqi security leadership and to President Saddam Hussein.

• U.S. President Bill Clinton wrote to Peres to personally reaffirm the United States "will continue to support the government and the people of Israel in building together a future of peace for the entire region."

Pollard granted Israeli citizenship

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — U.S. legal experts say last week's granting of Israeli citizenship to imprisoned spy Jonathan Pollard will not affect any application he makes for parole or clemency.

American legal experts are studying Israel's Nov. 21 conferral of citizenship on Pollard, who has been in jail for 10 years for spying for Israel.

But according to one U.S. Justice Department spokesperson, both parole and clemency "are open to citizens, non-citizens and dual citizens alike."

Neverthless, news of Israel's decison, which came 10 years to the day after Pollard was arrested, was greeted joyously in the spy's camp.

According to his Toronto-based wife Esther, Pollard's reaction was that it was "the happiest day in 10 years. I'm delighted and excited. I'm not alone anymore. I'm one with my people."

"We're overjoyed," Esther Pollard told The CJN last week, adding cautiously, though, that the window of opportunity for her husband's early release is closing.

Slain Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had asked U.S. President Bill Clinton to commute Pollard's sentence three times. Esther Pollard now hopes that Clinton will come through "as a gesture of sympathy" to Israel in the wake of Rabin's assassination.

"We are very pleased. I hope it leads to freedom," Pollard's father Morris said from South Bend, Ind. "The only route to go for now is [presidential] clemency."

Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres is expected to request that Pollard's life sentence be commuted when he meets Clinton in Washington on Dec. 11.

Israel's decision was announced by Interior Minister Ehud Barak last Tuesday, just moments before he was appointed foreign minister in Peres' new cabinet.

Pollard's first parole hearing was scheduled for earlier this month but has been rescheduled.

Now 41, Pollard was an American civilian intelligence analyst for the U.S. Navy when he was arrested in November 1985 outside the Israeli embassy.

He pleaded guilty to passing classified documents to Israel and in 1987 was sentenced to life in prison.

Israel's decision "sends a strong message that Jonathan is not alone anymore and that Israel is willing to accept full responsibility for him," said his wife.

Israel has previously granted citizenship in absentia to Prisoners of Zion or Refuseniks in the old Soviet Union, Esther Pollard pointed out.

Earlier this year, Israel denied Pollard's citizenship request. When Esther Pollard appealed to Israel's Supreme Court, which gave the government 30 days to show why his citizenship should be denied, the government relented.

Sources speculated the Israeli government extended the citizenship because it wants to protect its own interests and avoid divulging secret information in open court.

In a letter to Clinton and Peres last week, Esther Pollard urged continued efforts to secure her husband's release.

"By joining hands now and acting in unison to free Jonathan Pollard now ... a message of unity and strength would be created to honor the memory of Yitzhak Rabin," she wrote.

Pollard's only hope is a commutation from Clinton, said Esther Pollard, as there's "no chance" for parole, since there is a sheaf of negative recommendations in his file.

— With reporting by Ron Csillag in Toronto.

Archeological dig opposed

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Nearly 20,000 ultra-Orthodox Jews demonstrated here last Sunday against ongoing archeological excavations near the town of Modi'in in central Israel.

The demonstrators held a prayer vigil that included an invocation calling for cutting off the hands of the archeologists involved in the dig.

Demonstrations erupted near the site last week, after the remains of a burial cave with links to the Hasmonean period were uncovered.

Protesters said removal of bones found at the site defiled Jewish graves.

Hundreds of gold and silver coins dating from the end of the Bar Kochba revolt were found near the site where road workers discovered a tomb linked to the Maccabees.

The remains of a Second Temple-period village were also found nearby, as were ruins of a building similar to synagogues found at the Masada and Gamla archeological sites, Israel Radio reported.

Archeologists from Israel's Antiquities Authority described the find as extremely important.

The site includes three burial caves with some 23 containers for human bones.

Modi'in was the town where the family leader of the Maccabees, also known as the Hasmoneans, revolted against the Greek Seleucids in about 170 BCE.

CANADIAN MPs IN ISRAEL MARK HOLOCAUST

Israeli secret service reeling

"dragging our youth into extreme activities."

Even moderate right-wing politicians pointed fingers at the GSS. "The GSS is at least indirectly responsible for the atmosphere of hatred," charged Likud MK Uzi Landau.

Much of the ire of the right was directed at the now infamous poster of Yitzhak Rabin in an SS uniform which was distributed by Raviv at a Likud demonstration two months ago and shown on television.

"There must be an investigation into who funded and published that poster," said Likud MK Eliyahu Ben-Elissar. (An investigation completed this week found two teenaged brothers from Jerusalem, both yeshivah students, were responsible for producing the poster.)

Meretz MK Ran Cohen countered that the right wing is using the affair to "shake off responsibility for the atmosphere of incitement that preceded Rabin's murder."

Isolated voices on the left saw signs of a conspiracy of a different sort. Tel Aviv University historian Prof. Michael Harsgor said only a conspiracy by the GSS to kill the prime minister could explain the glaring lapses in security that enabled the murder to take place.

"Somebody in the GSS wanted this to happen. Somebody believed he could stop the peace process this way. Somebody allowed Raviv to incite and allowed Amir to act," said Harsgor.

A columnist for the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz concurred that a GSS agent sympathetic to Raviv's extreme right-wing views must have helped facilitate the assassination.

Whatever the truth — now being revealed in a closed-door commission of inquiry — the affair is already having repercussions on the image of Israel's much vaunted security service.

"It's a blow to our prestige that reduces our deterrent power in the eyes of the Arabs," said former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir,

"The motivation of the Arabs to make peace — as much as that motivation exists — will be reduced because of the damage to Israel's image of strength," added Likud activist and former ambassador Zalman Shoval.

In the last two weeks, the media have run stories that make high-ranking GSS officers sound more like an Inspector Clouseau movie than a John LeCarre thriller.

Noting the many jokes circulating about the GSS, Ha'aretz columnist Gideon Levy writes that "a body that was in the eyes of many Israelis a source of pride, and was a source of envy of security services all over the world, has now been transformed into the butt of jokes."

Most cabinet ministers reject appeals for reforms and instead have called for a halt to all criticism of the GSS.

Duo's hockey camp proves a resounding success

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the end of the summer and the start of the hockey season, Dave Harris' and Cory Shiner's work is done.

As owners, founders and CEOs of the Kids of Canada Hockey Camp (KCHC), they've tuned up their pre-teen athletes, put them through skating and passing drills, made them scrimmage and then turned them loose for a free-for-all game of shinny.

More than 60 kids, aged five to 13, enrolled in this, the inaugural season of the KCHC.

For Harris and Shiner, both 20, the camp was a raving success, even though at first it was life and death to get enrolment up.

Harris said the hockey camp project has been brewing since last summer, though Shiner is quick to add that the two friends have been talking about some sort of business project since their high school days.

Thanks to a $3,000 student venture loan from the government of Ontario, the two were able to put their idea for a summer hockey camp on ice.

For $235 per week, parents saw their kids receive four hours of on-ice instruction headed up by Shiner and several teenaged assistants. Also on the agenda were mini-golf, batting practice at baseball cages, games of football, soccer and baseball — "all the fun stuff," Shiner said. On Friday, they were taken for a pizza lunch. What more could a kid want?

The on-ice aspect of the camp focused on teaching basic skills, like skating and stickhandling and on developing confidence.

"Me and Cory have a motto," Harris said. "Aside from the kids being happy, the parents have to be happy that their kids have learned something."

A student of mass communications at Carlton University, Harris handled most of the camp's off-ice preparations. Shiner, enrolled in a recreational studies program at Centennial College, was in charge on the ice.

Indoor soccer franchise unveils its name, logo

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They've got a new uniform, a new name, a flashy logo featuring practically every color in the rainbow and they've signed a big-name player. All that's left is for the games to begin.

Well, there are probably a few more items left on the agenda before Toronto's first indoor professional soccer team takes to the field (make that the hockey rink), but the Toronto Shooting Stars Soccer Club and Academy has taken another step on the road towards its inaugural season that kicks off next October.

Team co-owner and president Francois Glasman officially launched the National Professional Soccer League's (NPSL) Shooting Stars at a news conference recently and introduced its first player, Raul Alfredo "Lalo" Maradona.

No, he's not that Maradona, he of international acclaim. Diego Maradona, the world-famous Argentinian national team star is Lalo's older brother, but Maradona junior boasts impressive credentials of his own.

Lalo, 28, played with big brother for Argentina at the 1993 Indoor World Championships. He was a member of the soccer-mad country's under-18 national team, he later joined the national team and most recently, he played for Toronto Italia of the CNSL.

In addition to the official team launch, the Shooting Stars' academy will inaugurate the first of its youth clinics on Jan. 12, said Randy Sageman, a spokesperson for the team. The clinics are designed to get young people involved in soccer, create grassroots support for the team and perhaps one day serve as a launching pad for future talent for the Shooting Stars, he said.

The Shooting Stars have adopted the motto, "For the Kids," and Glasman, who owns the franchise along with Dr. Morris Goldfinger, has promised to distribute 2,000 free tickets to minor league club players and inner city kids for each home game at Maple Leaf Gardens.

Glasman, whose French-accented voice has been heard on many TV and radio commercials, is owner of the Pele Soccer League in which more than 500 kids participate.

Superstar Israeli rocker sets music to poetry

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB News Editor

TORONTO – Called a postmodern Leonard Cohen by one critic, Israeli-born singer/songwriter David Broza performed at Lee's Palace Wednesday night to promote the release of two new albums in Canada David Broza and Stone Doors.

Broza has one triple platinum and five gold records in Israel, where he has reached superstar status. It has been estimated one out of three households in Israel has a Broza album. He is set to increase his fan base in North America with the release of these two albums.

Although he lives in New Jersey with his manager wife and three children, Broza travels to Israel once a month to perform for his loyal fans. He decided to record Stone Doors while in Israel recently.

"I knew it would be kind or risky to record Stone Doors in Israel," Broza said from his home, "but I was there and wanted to record it before winter so I could get on the road with it in the new year."

Besides Stone Doors he recorded a Hebrew album for his Israeli audience. "I found some really incredible musicians there; it was a loose and very enjoyable session."

Stone Doors was recorded in one take. "I'm still learning the words now," Broza laughed. "It all came out so easily. We recorded the whole thing in five or six days."

Broza, 40, was born in Haifa. His grandfather was the founder of Neve Shalom, the first Arab-Jewish village in Israel founded in 1970 to serve as a model of cooperation. Although he spent most of his teen years in Spain, Broza returned to Israel in 1974 to do his three-year military service.

"It started to bug me that my childhood friends were being drafted," Broza said. During the Yom Kippur War a close friend of his got killed. "For the first time I felt the pain of loss, it was the first experience of loss that I can remember."

Broza said he was feeling a tremendous amount of guilt at the time. "I felt that whatever else I do in my life, I had to get this [military service] done first." He was in the military from 1974 to 1977 and was called-up in 1982 to serve on the front-lines in the Lebanon invasion.

It was while he was in the military that a CBS record executive saw him perform and told him she wanted to sign him on. At the time, though, he wasn't interested. "I never thought of doing this professionally. I always meant this to be a pastime. I wanted to go to college."

In the meantime he'd hooked up with Israeli poet Jonathan Geffen who recorded two of Broza's songs. Both of which became hits in Israel. The record executive returned to Broza and he signed a five-record deal.

"I forgot about college and now I've just completed my third batch of five albums."

Although he's described by some as a folk-singer (perhaps because he does one-man concerts), if Stone Doors is any example, he's closer to rhythm and blues and bar rock 'n' roll than folk. More Colin James than Joan Baez and far more melodic and optimistic than Leonard Cohen.

"Primarily it's rock 'n' roll,"

Rockin' troubadour: Israeli-born singer/ songwriter David Broza performs here at one of his Jerusalem concerts. Although he's made his home in New Jersey for over a decade, Broza still returns to Israel one week in every month to perform to his loyal fans. It's been said that one in every three households in Israel has at least one David Broza album. Broza, who started off playing in shuls in Spain, has just released two albums in Canada, Stone Doors and a self-titled compilation. [WZPS photo]

Travel Talk

New Gate For Jerusalem: It took only four centuries, but a new gate has opened up to the Old City of Jerusalem. It's located on the Old City's southern wall between the Zion Gate and the Dung Gate.

This new entrance to the ancient capital was boarded up in the 16th century for security reasons by Ottoman ruler Sultan Suleiman the Magnificent. There's a great debate among scholars about when it was built. Some say it was constructed by the Crusaders in the 12th century, while Jerusalem's former chief archeologist, Dan Bahat, says it was part of a watchtower belonging to a Muslim dynasty.

Whatever its origins, the gate is the first new opening to the Old City since 1887.

Nature Magazine on Israel: Eretz Magazine, which many call the Israeli National Geographic, is the only English-language geographic magazine in Israel. Devoted to the country's natural, cultural and historical treasures, the magazine also serves as a guide to the latest touring opportunities in Israel.

Past issues have featured major stories on Gaza, Hebron, the Golan, Jericho, Nazareth's tourism comeback, Petra and other sites in Jordan, and Napoleon's exploits in the once and future land of Israel. Other pieces have dealt with important environmental issues, such as an assessment of the dangers of the planned cross-Israel highway.

Eretz reaches thousands of subscribers around the world and its Hebrew edition, Eretz Vateva, reaches 40,000 subscriber families in Israel. Both editions are available internationally. A year's subscription is $59.90. The Eretz representative in Canada is Tamar Savion, 20 Hearthstone Cres., North York, M2R 1G3. 416-636-6743.

New Developments in Jerusalem: The municipality of Jerusalem is working closely with the Ministry of Tourism and other organizations to create important new sites for Jerusalem 3000, the city-wide festival that is already underway and continues through much of 1996.

Several important projects have been initiated to provide the city with new permanent sites. The City of David site is being developed as Jerusalem's major archeological garden. Seats, a stage and fencing are being installed at a site in Malha capable of holding 30,000 people.

A 12,000-seat amphitheatre is being constructed at the Haas Promenade, overlooking one of the most beautiful landscapes in the city. The amphitheatre will feature seats along the natural slope, so as not to destroy its beauty.

Improvements are also being made to Ein Karem, Mea Shearim and various roofs and arches throughout the Old City.

New Tourism Organization: A new tourism organization that would have been unthinkable just a few years ago has arisen in the Middle East. The organization is called MEMTTA — the Middle East and Eastern Mediterranean Tourist Association — and its members include Israel, Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority, Tunisia, Turkey, Cyprus and Morocco.

MEMTTA brings together governments and travel-related businesses to promote tourism in the entire Middle East and Eastern Mediterranean region. Countries expected to join soon include Greece, Qatar, Kuwait, Bahrain and Oman.

The new association reflects the new open borders in the Middle East that allow tourists to travel with ease from Israel to Jordan and Egypt. Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, called MEMTTA "one of the most exciting by-products of the peace process."

Setting music to poetry

Broza says of his music. "It's got a real urban rock side to it. It's very intense."

Urban rock 'n' roll with a touch of his cultural influences. His music is very melodic; a mixture of American rhythm and blues, Spanish flamenco-style guitar and Mid-eastern rhythms.

A unique aspect to Broza's songs is the self-styled troubadour rarely writes his own lyrics. Most of his songs are written to classical and contemporary poetry.

"In Israel and Spain, where I grew up, it's common practice to write music to poetry. I never really got into writing my own lyrics to sing to others."

When on the road he always drops by local bookstores to see what's on the shelves that would inspire a song. "I dedicate a lot of my time to find lyrics I wish I'd written myself and could set to music.

"Most of the poems I sing tell a story. I grew up listening to Bob Dylan, Jackson Brown, Van Morrison, and the like. When I started writing my own songs I found lyrics which were close to the stuff I was hooked into in the first place. Today the poetry is much more varied." (He uses Walt Whitman and Percy Bysshe Shelley on Stone Doors.)

Broza readily admits he takes poetic licence with the poems he chooses; either editing out complete stanzas or changing some words.

"With the Shelley poem, I changed a couple of words – thy for example – and updated it a bit," he said. "That poem could have been written to anybody. It's a message anyone can understand. You don't have to be a poetry buff or an academic.

"I have a total respect for the original writers. To me, it's another way of exposing bodies of works to people who otherwise wouldn't get to hear poetry. It's a byproduct of what I do."

Broza is involved in workshops in 15 colleges across America discussing the art of turning poetry into song.

"I don't plan to spend the rest of my life here but by playing clubs particularly in the American mid-west I'm getting to know America real well. American culture gave rock 'n' roll to my generation; it's a second religion or discipline to me."

Although he's lived in the States for over a decade he still feels close political ties to Israel.

He sang one of his songs Yihye Tov (Things Will Get Better) for Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat at the Camp David accords. He was set to perform an updated version of the song in a concert before Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein on Nov. 7 to honor the first anniversary of the Jordanian/Israeli accord. Of course the ceremony was cancelled due to Rabin's assassination. Instead Broza performed the song at a memorial service to Rabin on Nov. 12.

"I've always been politically motivated. Being an Israeli you've always got to be politically motivated. I don't affiliate with any party or stream, I support whoever's going to bring peace to Israel."

If you didn't get a chance to see Broza last night, his two albums David Broza, a compilation of tracks from earlier U.S. albums, and Stone Doors, a new collection of 15 rock 'n' roll songs Broza-style are readily available in record stores across Canada.

Israel, EU reach pact on trade, economic ties

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BRUSSELS – Capping a period of long and difficult negotiations that began nearly two years ago, Israel and the European Union (EU) have signed a new accord to strengthen their political and economic relations.

The new accord, which replaces a 1975 trade and cooperation agreement between Israel and what was then known as the Common Market, will grant Israel special status to participate in the European Union's scientific and technological research and development projects.

The accord will also provide for expanded free trade between Israel and the 15 nations comprising the European economic bloc.

Israel hopes the new accord will help lessen Israel's growing trade imbalance with the EU which stands at $8 billion (US). The EU is Israel's main trading partner, receiving some 35 per cent of Israel's total exports.

The new agreement – which will have to be approved by the Knesset and the parliaments of the EU member states – will allow 90 per cent of Israeli agricultural products to be exempt from EU tariffs, compared with the current 70 per cent.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Life of Golda Meir: The Holy Blossom Stagecraft Company presents three performances of Golda, the authorized chronicle of the life of the former Israeli prime minister, by William Gibson. Set during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Golda relies upon humor, tragedy, suspense and heartbreak as it evokes a vivid portrait of this unique leader. Dedicated in memory of Yitzhak Rabin, the play portrays the hopes, fears, triumphs and disasters faced by the founders and builders of the nation of Israel.

Performances are at the Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., Toronto, Dec. 7 & 9 at 8 p.m., and Dec 10 at 7 p.m. For tickets ($8 to $12), call 416-789-3291, ext. 238. The Dec. 9 performance is a fundraiser for Kolel, the centre of Jewish learning, and includes a gala reception. Gala tickets may also be ordered by calling 905-709-1900.

The Holocaust at Harbourfront: Remain Silent, Auschwitz/Birkenau is a collection of 14 large photographs taken on the site of one of the most infamous death camps of WWII — nearly half a century later. According to Toronto photographer Jack Burman, who shot the collection of color and black-and-white photographs in 1994, the photos convey the emptiness he felt at encountering "the most intense torture and killing ground in human history."

The photos are accompanied by smaller photos taken by the German SS and maps, architectural plans and detailed captions. Dec. 2 to Mar. 3 in the photo passage at York Quay, Harbourfront Centre. Free.

Media Watch: Satisfy your curiosity with the colorful new journal Why, A Magazine About Life. The premier fall issue contains probing articles about alternative medicine and natural healing, Canada's cod stocks and turbot war, and other contemporary concerns.

Of special interest is the story How Heart Came Into the World, retold by master Jewish storyteller Dan Yashinsky, as well as the interview with Phyllis Lambert, founder of the Canadian Centre for Architecture. Rethinking Repentance, an essay by David Ester, focuses on the universal messages of religious holidays in general and the Jewish High Holy Days in particular.

Why Magazine is available on newsstands and stores.

Playwright Wins Award: Eye on Arts congratulates Toronto playwright Jason Sherman, recipient of a Governor General's literary award for his play Three in the Back, Two in the Head. Last week, in a ceremony at the Winter Garden Theatre in Toronto, Sherman and other winners each received a cheque for $10,000.

Yiddish Songs on the CBC: Yes, those were Yiddish lyrics you heard on the CBC radio show Gilmour's Albums recently. The songs came from Faye Kellerstein's CD recording A Feygele Zingt.

Kellerstein is still working with her Kinder-Chorus, a group of 15 children between seven and 12 years of age who performed a concert of Yiddish songs last summer in North York, and who will soon tape a show on Rogers Cable, Kellerstein reports. She and the Kinder-Chorus are scheduled to perform at the Beth David Chanukah luncheon, Sunday, Dec. 17.

Yiddish in Edmonton: Canadian-born film director Arthur Hiller, responsible for many popular films including The Americanization of Emily and Love Story, was in town last week to receive an honorary doctorate from his former alma mater, the University of Toronto. Hiller told CBC-Radio's Peter Gzowski that his parents, who once formed a Yiddish theatre troupe in Edmonton, instilled in him the values, such as respect for others, that have characterized his long, distinguished cinematic career.

Contemporary Russian Artists: A show of works by numerous leading artists includes the art of Shamil Nadrov, who recently had an exhibition at the Kremlin, and Vladimir Brainin, the subject of an exhibition currently at the Jewish Museum in New York. Marina Abony Fine Arts, 10 Cole Millway, off Ivor Rd. in the Yonge-Lawrence area of Toronto, Dec 2, 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. 416-481-5200.

In Brief: The Canadian Children's Opera Chorus performs a winter concert, containing works by Ralph Vaughan Williams, Andre Caplet, William Mathias, and various carols and music for Chanukah. Glenn Gould Studio, Dec 2 at 2 & 7.30 p.m., Dec. 3 at 2 p.m. Adults, $15. 416-205-5555.

The work of artists Marjorie Francoz, Donna Kagan and Richard Ungar are featured in a Chanukah Art Exhibition at the Holy Blossom Temple, Dec. 8 to Jan. 8. Opening reception, Dec. 13, 7.30 to 9.30 p.m.

Montreal artist Melvin Charney's unique study of architectural images conveyed through wire service photographs is being shown at The Power Plant, Harbourfront, Dec. 8 to Jan. 21.

Dear Jesse,

I am looking after my parents (mother, 75 and father, 83). They have lived on their own for the last 56 years, taking care of each other. Now, they are not well. Mother has Alzheimer's and Father has had two strokes and throat cancer. They are very proud people and do not accept help.

How do I get them help in the house or any other kind of support without their approval? How do I get help to keep them going?

E. H.

Dear E. H.,

Your letter demonstrates your caring and your concern. However, I am not clear as to what you mean by "looking after." Since there is no way for me to evaluate your parents capacity to function on their own or their quality of life, I would suggest that you examine your own feelings about how much pressure they are putting on you and how much pressure you're putting on yourself.

You must also understand that unless a geriatric assessment identifies them as incapable of making decisions or a danger to them selves or the community they have the right to determine how they live.

For your own comfort, I would suggest a caregiver support group for adult children.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Urgent action to calm fears

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A mounting sense of urgency in the Jewish community here over the spectre of another referendum and, even more pressingly, the possibility of an outflow of young Jews, has put into gear an unprecedented linkage between Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) and FEDERATION CJA to deal with these issues.

The multi-pronged approach will involve, most significantly, staging a series of Jewish community "consultations" across Canada in an effort to mobilize the provinces to keep Quebec within the federalist fold.

Meanwhile, in Montreal, the CJC-Q's youth commitee and FEDERATION CJA agencies, such as ProMontreal, the Young Adult Division (YAD) and the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ), will hold forums for youth — the segment of the community mobile enough to leave — to "honestly" speak to their fears, said Max Bernard, chair of CJC-Q's community relations committee.

Bernard promised that the forum, which will enlist the participation of experts providing "objective analysis," will not try to whitewash the situation or to "pull the wool over their [young people's] eyes" in order to get them to stay.

"We are not going to give unrealistic assessments to our youth," Bernard said.

"I'm not a judge on whether staying is good or bad. They can see what's going on. My sense is that there are a lot of questions people would like to have answered."

Asked if such a blunt approach would, in a sense, be at odds with the agenda of groups like ProMontreal, Bernard said he did not believe that to be an issue.

"My sense is that we have to be very objective and very realistic," he said. "I think it would be absolutely devastating if we were to do anything to try to mislead our youth."

As if to underscore the pervasive sense of uncertainty in the community — fuelled in part by the now-infamous ethnocentric remarks of Premier Jacques Parizeau and deputy premier Bernard Landry — FEDERATION CJA published a full page ad in last week's CJN to calm the community down and to present an outline of their plan of action.

Metro community hit hard by budget cuts

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The $6-billion cut in Ontario government spending will hit the Metro Jewish community hard:

• Baycrest Hospital loses $4 million in funding this year and must eliminate the equivalent of 64 full-time positions from its staff of 1,500. It faces possible cuts of another 13 per cent in the next two years.

• "We are facing deep cuts and there are tough decisions ahead for the Jewish community on what our core services should be," said Morris Zbar, an official of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT).

• The Jewish Family and Child Service took a "hit" of $390,000 in the first round of government cutbacks and faces more cuts in the next two years, while having to cope with the spinoff effects of job losses resulting from the cuts.

• A 25 per cent cut in services to Bernard Betel Centre is already being implemented and the agency faces another 25 per cent cut in funding next year.

Baycrest anticipated a five per cent cut across the board and was therefore not "surprised" by the Ontario government's action, said Moshe Greengarten, vice-president of public affairs. Though positions will be eliminated, a new mix of highly-trained staff will keep up the standard of nursing care, he said.

Some recipients of supplemental and welfare assistance may have to miss lunch or not have enough money to buy a loaf of bread because of the new $2 charge for drug prescriptions, said Marian Greenberg, a Bernard Betel volunteer. She said besides the $2, the new charges of $100 deductible and $6.11 pharmacist fee per prescription are a "real hardship" on seniors whose annual family income is below $24,000.

Greenberg said she needs eight prescriptions a month and this will cost her $16, plus $48.88 in fees, every month, in addition to the annual $100 deductible.

"My husband and I will have to revise our budget," she added.

She was indignant, claiming Premier Mike Harris had broken his promise not to cut health services.

Some agencies are awaiting word on how the massive cuts will affect day care and education, since the municipalities must decide how to apply the reductions.

The JFGT has already given an additional $370,000 to agencies to ease the burden of extra help needed as a result of earlier government cutbacks, Zbar said.

"We understand that the deficit has to be reduced, but it is a question whether the cuts had to be as deep, particularly since an income tax reduction is planned," he said.

Courses offered by the North York Board of Education to Jewish agencies are also in question, depending on how the board copes with the cuts to its funds.

"The implications are great for all social agencies," said Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS.

Bernard Betel director Esta Wall said all agencies have been asked to meet with Metro officials Dec. 13.

CANADA

Bourgault Rapped

MONTREAL — The Coalition of the Hellenic, Jewish and Italian Congresses and B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights last week called on Quebec premier-in-waiting Lucien Bouchard to denounce remarks by Quebec sovereigntist Pierre Bourgault, as quoted in the Journal de Montréal.

Bourgault slammed Jews, Italians and Greeks for voting as a bloc against sovereignty.

Horvath Honored

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada last week honored Dezso Horvath, dean of York University's faculty of administrative studies, Canada's largest graduate management school, for his "outstanding contribution to academia and business."

Nearly 500 people attended the annual Award of Merit Gala Dinner.

A Family Affair

VANCOUVER — A bar or bat mitzvah at Temple Sholom here is truly a family affair.

Each week, students in the b'nei mitzvah classes at both the temple's religious school and Vancouver's Jewish day schools meet, together with their parents, for a series of nine Sunday morning workshops.

Called the Al Shlosha Devarim program, parents and students take part in a weekly minyan and breakfast, and then study Torah, prayers and mitzvot.

Sorry, Wrong Number

MONTREAL — An incorrect telephone number appeared in this space last week in connection with Na'amat Canada's 1996 convention in Israel.

To register, contact Vivian Reisler at 514-488-0792.

ISRAEL

Katyusha Attack

JERUSALEM — The damage caused by last Tuesday's Hezbollah rocket attacks on the Galilee is likely to run to 10 million shekels ($3.3 million US), Kiryat Shmona Mayor Prosper Azran said last week.

Property tax authorities received compensation claims from some 100 home owners and two dozen car owners.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres said he holds Syria responsible for the Katyusha attacks, in which eight people were injured and dozens more had to be treated for shock.

Reports from Lebanon said Hezbollah fired about 35 rockets, of which more than 20 fell in Israel.

Israeli war planes retaliated the following day. At least one Hezbollah gunman was reported killed and two others wounded in a raid against suspected guerrilla targets north of the security zone.

Hamas Member Killed

JERUSALEM — About 200 IDF soldiers killed a wanted Hamas member last Tuesday during a siege at a house in the village of Deir Samet, southwest of Hebron.

Mohammed Masalmeh, 38, from Beit Awah, was wanted by Israeli authorities for over a year.

Rabbi Told to Resign

JERUSALEM — Religious Affairs Minister Shimon Shetreet last Tuesday asked the chief rabbi of Ramat Gan, Rabbi Ya'acov Ariel, to resign because of an article he wrote in 1993 in which he claimed that the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin fell into the category of an "indirect rodef" (traitor) who deserved death under certain circumstances.

Shetreet told Rabbi Ariel that if he did not step down, he would consider removing him from his post.

Settler Arrested

JERUSALEM — A 22-year-old Jewish settler was arrested here last week for trying to run Environment Minister Yossi Sarid's car off the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway in August.

Ohad Barat, an Elkana resident, was charged with endangering life, which carries a maximum 20-year prison term.

The charges claim Barat made obscene gestures at Sarid and tried several times to force his vehicle off the road.

Peres on Covenant

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres sent a strong message to PLO leader Yasser Arafat last week, saying if the clauses in the Palestinian Covenant calling for Israel's destruction are not cancelled by March, "the [peace] train will be halted."

Peres' ultimatum was made sharper by his demand that the decision to rescind the clauses be taken by both the Palestinian self-rule council, to be elected in the autonomous areas, and the Palestine National Council, representing the Palestinian leadership in Tunis.

Hey Bus Driver...

JERUSALEM — Some Egged bus drivers are disconnecting the mechanisms which limit the speed of their vehicles, Army Radio reported Monday.

The mechanisms were only recently installed on about 400 of Egged's newer buses — about 10 per cent of its fleet. They limit a bus's speed to 105 kilometres per hour, but some drivers have disconnected them, according to one former driver.

WORLD

Solidarity Rally

NEW YORK — A full house — as many as 20,000 people — are expected to attend an Israel solidarity rally planned for Madison Square Garden on the morning of Dec. 10.

Slated to appear are Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau, and Leah Rabin, widow of slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The date had been held open for President Bill Clinton, who reportedly said he would like to attend, but had scheduling problems.

Rabin Stamp Available

NEW YORK — A postage stamp commemorating the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin is scheduled for release this week by the Israel Postal Authority.

The date of issue, Dec. 5, marks the 30th day day after Rabin's assassination.

The stamp bears an official photograph of Rabin, along with the Israeli flag and the years of Rabin's life, 1922-1995, at the bottom. On the right side, Rabin's name and title appear in Hebrew, English and Arabic.

It's available through the Israel Philatelic Agency at 535 Fifth Ave., Suite 300, New York, N.Y. 10017 U.S.A. or by calling 1-800-607-2799. (See photo of stamp, p. 33).

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

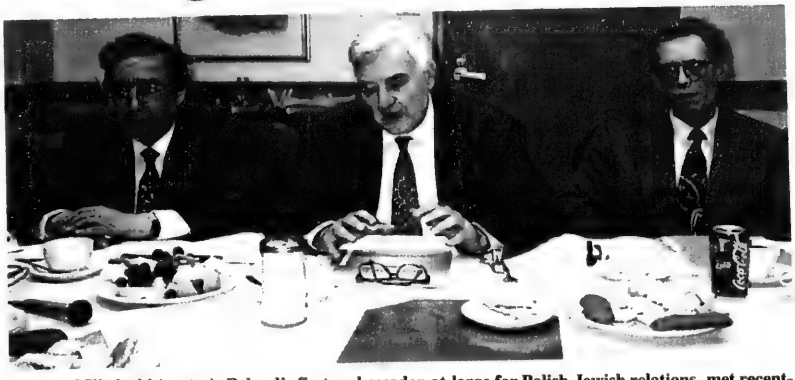
Poland building bridges to Jewish Diaspora

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter



Krzystof Sliwinski (centre), Poland's first ambassador-at-large for Polish-Jewish relations, met recently with officers of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. Accompanying him were Wojciech Tychinski (right), Poland's consul general in Toronto and Janusz Mantykiewicz, Polish consul in Toronto. [Daniel Fine Photo]

TORONTO — Poland is reaching out to Jews.

Krzysztof Sliwinski, a senior Polish diplomat, has been appointed Poland's first ambassador to the Jewish Diaspora.

"For historical, moral and spiritual reasons, we must do everything possible to build bridges and to overcome negative emotions," explained Sliwinski in an interview at the Polish Consulate.

Poland, he acknowledged, is the first — and so far only — country in Eastern Europe to have created such a position. "I am very much conscious of the bitterness in Polish-Jewish relations," said Sliwinski, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' former spokesperson and ex-ambassador to Morocco. His overall objective, he said, is "to improve the image of Poland and Poles in Diaspora circles and in Israel."

Since his appointment last August, Sliwinski, 55, has visited several cities in the United States. Late last month, he stopped in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, where he met, among others, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith officials.

In the near future, Sliwinski intends to visit several Western European nations, Israel and Russia.

He said he owes his position to Poland's outgoing foreign minister, Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, an honorary citizen of Israel who has long worked to improve Poland's sometimes uneasy relationship with Jews.

Bartoszewski, an Auschwitz survivor, is expected to step down later this month, following Lech Walesa's defeat in the recent presidential election. He was beaten by Aleksander Kwasniewski, a former Communist, in a close race.

A founder of the Warsaw-based Association for Polish-Jewish Friendship, Sliwinski said that his mandate will not be aversely affected by the change in government.

"My job will exist after Mr. Bartoszewski leaves," he said. "I have no doubt of that. I know Mr. Kwasniewski very well, and it's unthinkable that he would abolish this position."

Poland, he explained, is "deeply conscious" of the importance of improving its ties with the Diaspora.

"The Foreign Ministry is aware how this issue affects Poland's national interests and its drive toward full democracy.

"Anti-Semitism is a sort of litmus test for democracy, and we want to be members of the democratic world. We're rightly judged on how we deal with this issue."

Sliwinski said that political anti-Semitism is an insignificant phenomenon in Poland today. "In the last presidential campaign, only one candidate was anti-Semitic and he won 0.4 per cent of the vote."

However, popular anti-Semitism is stronger. "You can hear statements and illusions that are totally unacceptable in a pluralistic society," he said. "There is still considerable stereotyping about 'mythological' Jews."

Sliwinski promised "to ring alarm bells" in the event of anti-Semitic outbursts. Looking back, he conceded that the legacy of the past imbues Polish relations with Jews. "We have to overcome the very long period after World War II when there was little contact."

Since acquiring independence in 1918, Poland — home to about 3.3 million Jews before the war — has been buffeted by outbreaks of anti-Semitism.

Jews were subjected to pogroms and economic boycotts in newly-independent Poland. During the Holocaust, some Poles collaborated with the Nazis, while some helped Jews. In the wake of the Six Day War, during which Poland broke diplomatic relations with Israel, upwards of 30,000 Jews fled the country, forced out by state-sponsored anti-Semitism.

In the 1990 presidential election, Walesa was accused of pandering to anti-Jewish sentiment, and more recently, a Roman Catholic priest, Father Henryk Jankowski, delivered an anti-Semitic sermon in Walesa's presence.

During his visit to Canada, Sliwinski raised a number of issues, ranging from Poland's links with Israel to Jewish property claims.

"Our relations with Israel are developing very well," he said. "It is not enough to say they are good. They are excellent, with close co-operation in many fields."

Sliwinski disclosed that proposed legislation will enable the remaining Jews of Poland to reclaim Jewish cemeteries, as well as former synagogue buildings, shtiebls, mikvahs, schools, community centres, orphanages, hospitals, ritual slaughter houses and one old people's home.

The legislation, he said, is likely to become law within six months.

Under the Law of Reprivatization, expected to be enacted by 1997, Jews will also be able to claim private property.

"It is impossible to put a dollar value on it," he noted.

Claims can be submitted by survivors and their children and relatives.

Officially, there are 6,000 Jews in the country, Sliwinski said. But Israel's embassy in Warsaw believes that 40,000 to 50,000 Poles can be defined as Jews under the Law of Return.

"The situation of Jews in Poland is good," he observed, saying that young Polish Jews are rediscovering their roots and establishing community institutions like schools and clubs.

Sliwinski said a new Jewish museum is planned for Warsaw, adjacent to the city's main Holocaust memorial in the former Nazi ghetto. Jews in the Diaspora will be asked to contribute funds.

Since 1990, school texts have been rewritten to better reflect the history of Jewish settlement in Poland.

According to Sliwinski, Polish publishers brought out more than 500 titles on Jewish topics last year, tapping an obvious interest in Jewish culture.

In conclusion, Sliwinski said that the Catholic church is redoubling its efforts "to build bridges with the Jewish community."

Academic ponders a refounded Zionism

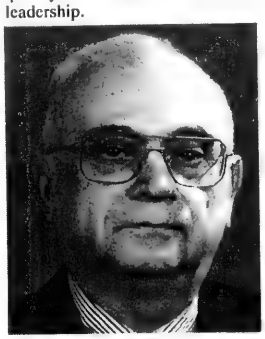
Yehezkel Dror is a strategic thinker. And that is quite an understatement.

"The Middle East," he said, "is an area of the world with a high probability for low probability events." That is how he spoke throughout our interview, succinctly, epigrammatically, with a flair for the dramatic, but always thoughtfully.

He was in Toronto last week at the invitation of Victoria College of the University of Toronto to take part, along with almost two dozen other renowned scholars and thinkers, in a three-day World Leadership Program. This prestigious, highly innovative, unique program was aimed, among other things, at "promoting peace through international dialogue and reflection on serious world problems" and "offering students an inspiring educational experience ... with world leaders whose experience is invaluable."

Dror was a worthy participant. For all his adult life he has been reflecting on serious world problems, advising governments around the world on global issues, national security affairs and policy planning, and helping them to upgrade their capacity to govern. He is known as the "doctor to governments" and "mentor to rulers." He has received numerous academic and professional distinctions. He has written numerous works. He is also the only current Israeli member of The Club of Rome, an elite think tank composed of 100 members from 52 countries on five continents dedicated to seeking long-term, strategic perspectives on inter-connected global problems.

I was lucky enough to spend 90 minutes with him. Our conversation ranged across a number of subjects including the peace process, the future of the Middle East, Israeli society, Israel-Diaspora relations, the influence of technology on the political process in Israel and in the West and the quality of international political leadership.



Yehezkel Dror

Alas, I cannot capture in the limited space of this column the breadth of his thinking or the beauty of the interwoven, inter-connected pattern of his ideas. Nor can I capture the enthusiasm and the excitement with which he spoke, or the precision with which he sought to refine the nuances of his words.

What follows are merely pieces of his remarks, disconnected though not necessarily disjointed:

"The Oslo agreements created new facts; they cannot be reversed ... Humanity as a whole is in rapid movement, as is the Middle East, as is Israel ... That there will be a Palestinian state is a new reality. In relation to other Arab states, it will be relatively progressive. This will have implications for other states in the area, notably Saudi Arabia. It will also open up the possibility for Israel to stabilize relations with Islamic states in the Middle East and in the Far East. This may not neccessarily, though, lead to stability in the Middle East."

"Israel's problems are harder than most other countries' in the West; thus, what's good enough in terms of the the quality of politicians for others is not good enough for us ... Politicians do not properly fulfill their function of educating, enlightening and setting an example for the public ... Television has the potential for being an excellent educational instrument but it is ruining politics and politicians ... Once, as Descartes declared, the fundamental principle of self-discovery was cogito ergo sum. – I think therefore I am. Now it is video ergo sum. – I see therefore I am.

"The dynamics of Israel are highly positive. But this alone does not assure survival. Israel must help individuals to choose to remain a Jew based upon positive motivations other than the duty to keep alive the memory of the people who perished in the Holocaust."

What animated Dror most, it seemed to me, was his elaboration on a theme which he has been developing for over a decade and on which he is currently working. With Yoda-like inscrutability, Dror focussed his gaze on me and spoke of refounding Zionism.

Refounding Zionism will be the name of a book to be published in Hebrew, English and other languages in 1996 and 1997. It is devoted to the reconstruction of Zionist values, he explained, "so as to serve as a policy compass for Israel and, somewhat differently, for the Jewish people." It will be part of a larger corpus of policy-oriented works which will put forward concrete recommendations to assist Israel and the Jewish people to thrive and make significant contributions to human development in a rapidly changing world.

"Being a Jew is a privilege precisely because it provides us individually and collectively with a sense of a global mission. And the present state of humanity requires that we develop a global mission. The need for it is now. Judaism has shown, historically, that it was always able to contribute to making the future better. Part of the meaning of life for the individual is to find a way of contributing."

My privilege last week was a double one, not only in being Jewish, but also in being with Yehezkel Dror.

Branson status still unclear

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though the proposal "is not cast in stone," Ontario Health Minister Jim Wilson gave no assurance Nov. 27 that North York Branson and other hospitals in Metro Toronto will not be closed or merged.

"I hear you," he told Dr. Wayne Potashner, in response to the explanation that elderly patients in the Branson area are "afraid" of going seven kilometres west to York-Finch hospital, with which Branson is to be merged under recommendations of the Metro Toronto District Health Council (MTDHC).

Wilson said new data will be considered, but he did not promise any specific action on Branson.

The health minister gave an unusual hearing at Queen's Park to 150 members of the Physicians Division of the United Jewish Appeal, and appeared to enjoy a frank exchange of views about hospital closings, touchy negotiations with the Ontario Medical Asociation and proposed restrictions on doctors' rights.

"We will proceed and it will get noisy," Wilson said, referring to the battle over hospital closings. But, he said, the government does not have "cold feet" because the need to save money is so urgent.

Doctors affiliated with Salvation Army Grace, St. Michael's, Wellesley, York Central and Branson hospitals fired questions at the minister, while others asked about the breakdown in negotiations with the OMA.

No other group gives as much to the general community as the UJA Physicians Division, Dr. Charles Gold, UJA co-chair, later told the meeting.

For their part, the UJA doctors gave a polite hearing to the minister and applauded at the end, even though he said doctors must go where the jobs are.

The minister promised there would be no cut in the $3.5-billion cap for physicians' services and even promised a "little extra money" to recruit doctors for rural and northern posts.

One doctor complained that the cap meant physicians were paying out of their own pockets for the trivial visits some patients make, and for the medical services given to new immigrants, who are immediately handed OHIP cards.

Wilson replied that the message about cutting out unnecessary visits should go to Ottawa, because the federal government refused to open up the Canada Health Act. "I don't want to make any comment about immigrants," he said.

Asked how the government can cut the number of chronic beds from 3,100 to 1,900, as the MTDHC recommends, Wilson conceded that the people who write reports do not always know how to implement them.

He said his department is considering a drug user fee for some seniors as is the case in nine provinces.

To the many questions about strained relations between his department and the OMA, Wilson advised the doctors to stick with the OMA "and keep talking to us."

He added, "They [OMA] walked away from the table. I'm still at it."

In broad brush strokes, Wilson painted a picture of the profession's future, stating, "Medicine is at a crossroads," and some changes are needed.

On the province's overall financial picture, Wilson said another mini-budget may be necessary in a few months to cut expenditures, and that by the time of the next election, his government may present a 25-year plan to balance the books.

No billing numbers will be taken from present doctors, but the 600 due to graduate should be showing some concern about where they will be allowed to practise, Wilson said.

The meeting was described as "useful," by Dr. Steven Gottesman, co-chair with Dr. Howard Price. Dr. Lawrence Cohen and Dr. Michael Gould arranged the meeting.

JF&CS defers decision on adolescent residence

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) last week voted to defer a controversial decision on whether to close Ontario's only residence for troubled Jewish teenagers.

JF&CS will decide the fate of the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre residence at a board meeting Dec. 14.

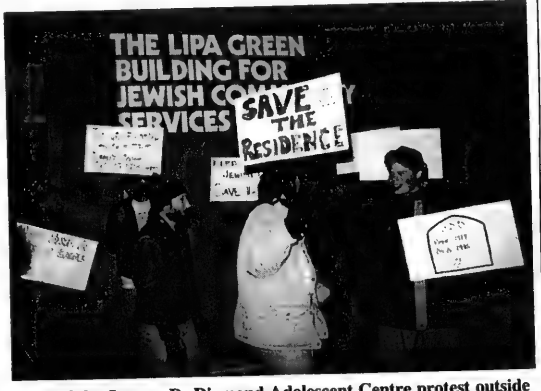
"We need more time to study this," said JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe, after hearing arguments from union representatives of the centre's staff.

A JF&CS proposal concluded last month that because of severe provincial budget cutbacks, the residence should be closed and its clients shifted to Youthdale Treatment Centre, a Metro children's mental health centre that provides counselling, treatment and education, also in a residential setting.

But critics say Youthdale is not a Jewish environment and closing the Diamond Centre's residence would rob the Jewish community of a valuable service.

About two dozen staff of the centre protested last week outside the Lipa Green Building, just before a JF&CS board meeting.

"We're pleased we've been heard," said centre counsellor Dierdre Harnett after JF&CS chose to defer the matter. "At least now, we have the option of time."



Staff of the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre protest outside the Lipa Green Building last week. [Ron Csillag Photo]

The Diamond Centre, situated on a quiet north Toronto street, operates two programs: day treatment and classes for up to 18 teens, and the six-bed residence for those with more serious problems — histories of abuse, emotional disorder and severe behavior. The residence is fully kosher and staffed around the clock, all year.

The facility was opened in 1974 as the Centre Shelanu and renamed in 1982 after the longtime former director of JF&CS.

JF&CS argues that upkeep of the residence is too expensive: about $250 per child per day, mainly because of the staff of seven that's needed.

The agency says that given the last round of social service budget cuts in July, the residence's deficit would be $20,000 for 1995-96 and is projected at up to $45,000 for 1996-97.

Maintaining a five-day residence or operating on a 10-month basis "have been explored but do not make sense for the troubled population" the residence serves, the study says.

Youthdale was planning to close a six-bed residence of its own, which would now be maintained for JF&CS referrals under the proposal.

Funding for the residence would be cut from JF&CS's budget by Queen's Park and transferred to Youthdale.

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair.

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. "The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5; regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Jewish groups urge court to reject Nemsila ruling

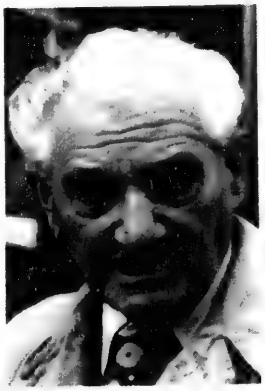
By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parliament could never have intended to create a law under which an immigrant could lie to immigration authorities about his past and then be immune from deportation for the very acts concealed, a Federal Court judge was told last week.

In a judicial review of a decision by immigration adjudicator Ed McNamara, counsel for four Jewish groups argued that the legislation in effect when alleged war criminal Josef Nemsila entered Canada in 1950 must not be interpreted to confer a bonus on perpetrators of a fraud.

Lawyers representing Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and the Coalition of Concerned Congregations joined federal lawyers in arguing against McNamara's decision, which ruled that Nemsila could not be deported because he had obtained Canadian domicile after living in Canada for five years.

If correct, that interpretation of the law would be "truly ironic" since it would give Nemsila greater rights than someone who had obtained Canadian citizenship, argued Congress lawyer Ed Morgan. A citizen could be denaturalized and then deported, he said, while Nemsila, who only had established domicile, could not.



Josef Nemsila

That is an "irrational" inequality and is inconsistent with the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Morgan said.

The Congress lawyer also pointed out that Canada's international law obligations require it to "not be a safe haven for war criminals." Canadian immigration legislation must be interpreted in light of the obligation to bring Nazi war criminals to justice, he said.

John B. Laskin, representing the Wiesenthal Centre, argued parliament did not intend to protect from deportation those who entered Canada by fraud. Rather, in establishing the concept of domicile in the early years of the century, its intent was to protect from deportation those who had intitially entered Canada properly, had left, and then returned, he argued.

The Deschenes Commission into Nazi war criminals in Canada studied the issue and "found in favor of the view that domicile is predicated on the legality of the landing [entry] that preceded it," Laskin said.

No public policy principle would be advanced by giving benefits to those who enter Canada by fraud, he added.

B'nai Brith lawyer David Matas argued that domicile cannot be obtained when entry to Canada was obtained fraudulently. Nemsila, or others with domicile, would be protected from deportation only if the misrepresentation on landing was by mistake, Matas suggested.

Furthermore, the Citizenship Act allows citizenship to be voided by proof of fraud. The Immigration Act can be read consistently with that legislation if domicile is also voided through proof of fraud, Matas said.

Ken Narvey, representing a group of Montreal congregations, argued that Nemsila's landing was not lawful and that he was in the same position as someone who entered by force or stealth.

Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe, representing the Immigration Ministry, argued that Nemsila failed to indicate he was a commander in the Slovak Hlinka Guard from 1939-45, had been convicted by a postwar Czechoslovak court and spent two years in custody before escaping to Austria.

Because he did not make any of that known to the Canadian visa officer who interviewed him he was not lawfully admitted to Canada, could not be considered landed and therefore, could not obtain domicile.

The process of "landing" means more than merely having a document stamped by the proper authority, Amerasinghe argued.

The immigration legislation in effect in the 1950s should not be interpreted to give Nemsila the protection of Canadian law if he lied to enter and "gets away with it" while he established domicile, he added.

Barbara Jackman, who represents Nemsila, will present her arguments before Justice James Jerome sometime in January.

National stresses

National stresses are buffeting Canadians. And last week the winds were blowing especially hard. It began with the reopening of the "constitutional dossier." The government tabled its post-referendum resolution in the House of Commons proposing to recognize Quebec's distinct language, culture and civil law and offering four regional vetoes – Atlantic, Quebec, Ontario and the West – to future constitutional amendments.

The resolution met with immediate scorn, naturally enough, from the separatists. But the Reform party and some of the western premiers also rejected it.

Later in the week, federal Human Resources minister Lloyd Axworthy unveiled his program to recast one of the key supporting poles of Canada's once vaunted safety net, unemployment insurance. The bill alters the structure of entitlement to benefits, reduces the level of benefits and attempts to devolve more job training authority to the provinces. It also purports to save the government almost $2 billion, most of which will be used to cut the deficit.

The bill met with immediate scorn, naturally enough, from the separatists. But Labor and other leaders also rejected it.

Statistics Canada raised fears that the economy may be stalling, or worse, heading again into recession. It released the unhappy news that 44,000 jobs were eliminated from the Canadian economy in November, the biggest one-month drop in three years.

And of course, Ontarians had to withstand additional bad economic weather in the form of a $6-billion reduction in the provincial budget over the next three years. The cost of virtually all public services will rise; thousands of public servants will lose their jobs.

When storms are raging, the instinct for self-preservation takes over. However, in closing the shutters, we must be careful not to become oblivious or indifferent to the predicament of less fortunate others who can not find shelter from the storm. We will write more on this subject in the coming weeks.

National calm

It is now clear that one of Prime Minister Shimon Peres' first priorities in the troubled and uneasy aftermath of Yitzhak Rabin's murder is to try to instil a measure of national calm in the country. In this space last week we commented on his effort to allay the fears of the moderate settler community by his appointment of Rav Yehuda Amital to the cabinet and by his coalition discussions with some of the religious parties. As of this writing, those discussions are ongoing.

But the prime minister's efforts are also aimed beyond the settler community to the community at large. Appearing before the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee last week, even as Katyusha rockets were slamming into the north, he warned the PLO: "If the Palestinian Authority does not not stand by its promise to cancel the provisions of its covenant calling for Israel's destruction within two months after the general elections slated for Jan. 20, the [peace process] train will stop."

He told the committee the final status discussions, which are scheduled to begin in May 1996, will likely take up to three years to conclude. But, he added, he did not foresee any substantial progress in the discussions before the October 1996 elections to the Knesset, thereby implying that the next elected government of Israel will have the opportunity to review and to finalize the peace front with the Palestinians. Peres also disclosed his "red lines" in the final status agreement. No foreign army would be positioned west of the Jordan River, thereby assuring the supremacy of Israel's security capability. And Jerusalem will remain united under Israeli sovereignty, serving as the capital city of Israel alone, thereby allowing no political compromise whatsoever over Jerusalem.

Peres' statements and actions are intended to provide the people of Israel with a margin of calm as the IDF continues its deployment from the heavily Arab-populated cities and towns of the West Bank. It is hoped that within this margin, the nature of the expression of opposition to the government's policies will be pushed to the centre of civil and democratic discourse.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Dec. 6, 1887 The Beth Jacob Congregation of Hamilton, Ontario received its charter. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Two Jews bridge their differences

Five days after Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, I was blessed with the birth of my son.

To me, Rabin's murder is a compound tragedy. Like all Jews, I am disturbed that a Jewish fanatic murdered the elected leader of the State of Israel. I am doubly crushed because I support the essence of the Oslo accords.

My wife Lynne understands this and agreed to "Isaac" as our son Daniel's middle name. Combining pride in my son with a simple tribute to Rabin, I numbed a personal pain and, however fancifully, believed I had contributed something to the process of collective Jewish healing.

Imagine my shock and rage when I phoned the mohel and he informed me that Lynne's Reform conversion to Judaism was inadequate. Therefore, he explained, the ceremony which normally celebrates a new male addition to the Jewish community would be altered and become a "circumcision for the purpose of conversion." Otherwise, warned the mohel, my son would not be fully accepted as a Jew in Israel. Patronizingly he lectured that Daniel might not qualify under Israel's Law of Return.

I shot back that unless the Orthodox had pushed through their agenda recently, Daniel, Lynne and I remain well protected by the Law of Return. (That is, I am Jewish "enough" under the Nuremberg Laws.) Furthermore, I bristled, the Israel from which I seek acceptance, the Israeli military in which I volunteered and the Israel in which I spent a year on a postdoctoral fellowship, is not the same Israel of which he speaks — at least not yet.

Seeking moral support, I called my brother, who was generous enough to arrange the brit in the first place. Not much more religious than I, my brother did remind me of what is most admirable in the Orthodox: their determination to honor G-d by upholding His revealed laws — as they understand them — as rigidly as possible. My brother assured me that the perceived slight and rejection was my concoction, not the mohel's.

Besides, as my practical but unsubtle brother reminded me, this particular mohel's medical reputation is outstanding; so I should swallow my pride.

I did. As it turned out, the mohel was indeed kind and gentle. Daniel barely cried. The mohel and I shook hands and I thanked him sincerely. He responded with a genuine mazel tov. As Jews, we refused to part company on bad terms.

Angered by Parizeau's remarks

As a immigrant to Canada as of June 6, 1944, I am very gratified to Canada, the country that gave me my freedom.

After working two weeks on my job, I volunteered to make fur vests for the Canadian sailors in the navy.

I consider myself a very good Canadian, obeying the laws of the land, paying my federal and provincial taxes and my business taxes, and contributing to Canadian charities.

I was quite disturbed with Mr. Parizeau's remarks that they lost the referendum because of money and the ethnics. You, Mr. Parizeau, just ignited the flames giving your (separatists) Parti Québécois a free hand for another Kristallnacht. I hope it will never happen again.

Albert J. Lichter
Toronto

Come back to Quebec

It is with a great deal of frustration that I read reports such as "Referendum vote scares ex-Montrealers." (CJN, Nov. 9) Does it ever occur to these ex-Montrealers that tens of thousands of them left the province in the period between the two referenda? That had they still been able to vote, the No would have had a far greater majority and Canada would not have been teetering on the brink?

Of course people should be free to live wherever they choose. However, when a ship starts listing, the crew makes the best effort to repair the fault rather than jump overboard.

Many thousands of Canadians across the country expressed their love for Quebec and for the country as a whole. Would it be expecting too much for some of them to come live in Quebec, even for a limited period? This cross-cultural experience would be a boon to everybody concerned and would certainly help keep the country whole and healthy.

N. Ravel
Montreal

'I'm staying in Quebec'

Before this referendum campaign began, my knee-jerk reaction to the prospect of Quebec separation was, like most young members of our community: "If Quebec separates, I'm leaving." In the weeks leading up to the vote, as poll after poll showed this scenario as a potential eventuality, I gave more thought to my future. If Quebec separated, where would I go, Vancouver? Ottawa? or G-d forbid ... Toronto?

Throughout this campaign, many Canadians have declared that their Canada includes Quebec. For myself, however, Canada not only includes Quebec, it is Quebec! This is my home and despite all of its shortcomings this is where I intend to stay. Given the Oct. 30 result, I have a new found resolve to build this province in consort with my fellow Quebecers: English, French and any other language one may choose to speak. I feel more driven and passionate than ever that I must work toward the ultimate goal of a strong and united Canada.

So, I may be bucking a trend here, but I'm sorry Vancouver, Toronto, even Boston or Chicago, You're not getting this educated young Jewish anglophone Quebecer. I'm more convinced than ever that my place is to stay right here in Montreal, Quebec, Canada!

David Lisbona

Perspectives

Jewish culture in the Canadian context

Earlier this year, The CJN carried a six-part series about the Jews of Canada. With the last installment in that series, we promised a wrap-up essay on the subject. This is the concluding part of the essay which began in The CJN last week.

By GERALD TULCHINSKY

Integration and assimilation have proceeded apace within Canadian society since the 1920s. This is often the most perplexing aspect of the modern Jewish experience. The ground rules for Jewish participation in Canadian society shifted considerably between 1921 and 1994. Barriers began to wither in the aftermath of World War II, especially since the 1960s, and are still falling away. Assessments of this transformation, however, are at best mixed. What's wrong, one might ask, with integration, with prosperity, with acceptance? The old restrictions on housing, education, employment and social life were good?

Within the fences, a Canadian Jewish world slipped away between the 1920s and the 1990s. The use of Yiddish virtually disappeared, the daily newspapers folded and most of their readers died off. Jewish trade unions like the International Ladies Garment Workers, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the Furriers and the Cap and Hat Makers, whose feisty leaders organized their rank and file to fight through the difficult strikes during the interwar period, mostly against Jewish bosses, are now bereft of Jews. The sons and daughters of the operators, pressers, cutters and packers attended university and professional schools and moved uptown or to the suburbs.

The old Jewish neighborhoods of Montreal's "The Main," Toronto's Kensington market, Winnipeg's "North End," none of them ever entirely or even mostly Jewish, now have virtually no Jewish residents. Other struggling and intergenerationally upwardly mobile immigrants live in the houses they once inhabited, while the old syngogues — many with Hebrew lettering still in place — have been lovingly converted to Baptist and Pentecostal chapels for new Chinese or South American Canadians. The old delicatessens have disappeared or changed to fashionable ethnic eateries where uptowners drop in for Jewish "soul food." The rude waiters — a Jewish specialty, to be sure — no longer wait on tables.

For the world of the immigrant generation we must search the writings of those who recorded the words and music of Jewish memory, including, among others, Adele Wiseman, Jack Ludwig, Morley Torgov, Freidele Bruser, Mordecai Richler, Norman Levine, Irving Layton and works of the prince of Canadian Jewish letters, Abraham Moses Klein, who composed such poignant verses of yearning for the Jewish soul caught in the unyielding web of modernity, while looking back to the past and remembering the sweet smells and Oriental sound of old days. Is there a new generation who will capture the music of those yearning souls?

But what of the present and future? Among the major transformations experienced in the last 20 years or so is the growing complexity of the Jewish community's organizational structure. Since the 1960s, fundraising for domestic communal needs and Israel has been dominated by the local federations of organizations which run combined appeals and allocate monies to a large number of charities, including hospitals, facilities for seniors and a wide variety of educational and welfare institutions. (It must be noted that some Jews also contribute generously to many non-Jewish Canadian causes.) The federations and the moneyed elite who are the big givers and thus control them have enormous power to influence the communities in many ways. Power has become centralized not only because of the fact that "money talks," but also because the sociology of the community has been altered profoundly by several far-reaching transitions it has experienced since the 1960s.

The old Jewish left has virtually disappeared. The Jewish working class is gone and so is the ideology that sustained many of its members in their beliefs that a better world could be created through the inculcation of collectivist values. The Jewish radical left in Canada had been in trouble since the early 1950s, when many Russian Jewish intellectuals were rounded up by Soviet police and shot, bloody testimony to the virulent anti-Semitism that was embedded in Stalinism. The Moscow doctors' trials fragmented the Jewish left even more, while the allegations against Rudolph Slansky in Czechoslovakia in 1952 drove many young Jewish Marxists out of the movement in tears. In the 1970s and 1980s, the tribulations of Natan Scharansky, Ida Nudel and other "refuseniks" who made public their desire to leave for Israel, further discredited the radical left among Jews.

What made the biggest difference, however, was the fact that the former Soviet Union and its satellites opposed Israel's existence by supplying the Arab enemies with weapons at the same time that a stream of anti-Semitic invective poured forth from Moscow.

TWO GIANTS OF CANADIAN JEWISH CULTURE

Childhood and lifelong friends, David Lewis, left, and A.M. Klein in Montreal in the early 1920s. Inset is the copy of the cover of The Canadian Jewish Times, 1912, published on the eighth anniversary of the death of Theodor Herzl. Photos reprinted from A Coat of Many Colours, Two Centuries of Jewish Life in Canada, Irving Abella, Lester & Orpen Dennys, 1990.

Meanwhile, the moderate Jewish left continued a more vibrant existence in the New Democratic Party and Zionist labor bodies like the Histadrut, Pioneer Women and various summer camps for Jewish youth. But the fervor is more rhetorical than substantive because social life has changed so significantly.

Canadian Jewish geography has altered dramatically since the 1950s. The power centre of Montreal, the quality of whose Jewish cultural life was unparalleled in Canada, began its long descent from primacy. Separatist terrorism, the October 1970 crisis, the electoral success of the Parti Québécois, Bill 101 and other language laws, and the rise of pure laine aspect of Québécois racism, have had a powerful impact on Montreal's anglophone Jewish youth. Large numbers complete their degrees at McGill and Concordia before moving to Toronto.

Montreal Jewry, therefore, is rapidly aging, though with a spirit of Yiddishkeit which can still fill the auditorium of the venerable Yiddish Folks Bibliotek for great events like Jewish Book Month.

But numbers tell several stories. We learn from them that Toronto's and Vancouver's Jewish communities grow, while Montreal's and Winnipeg's stagnate or decline, as do the small communities in northern Ontario and Quebec, the Maritimes and the Prairies.

Urbanization, therefore, proceeds apace and Canadian Jewry loses its connection with small-town Canada. Morley Torgov's farewell to Sault Ste. Marie and Freidele Bruser's memories of small-town Saskatchewan stand as permanent literary testimonies to the ambiguities of Jewish life in those small places on the Canadian frontier.

Significant demographic changes are reflected in Jewish birth rates, which recent decennial censuses show trail the national average by notable percentages. Meanwhile, intermarriage rates are approaching 40 per cent and are almost the same for Jewish females and males. These facts raise questions about Jewish survivability in Canada into the 21st century. Some reassurance is provided by the migration of Jews from other countries, notably from the former Soviet Union and Israel, but the weakness of traditional Jewish culture among most Jews in both of those countries poses further questions and doubts, not to mention major challenges for Jewish religious and educational institutions in the metropolitan cities where they settle.

As we approach the end of the 20th century and the 230th anniversary of the founding of Canada's organized Jewish community, therefore, we note the basic problem of how Judaism can survive if, as present trends seem to suggest, there might soon not be enough committed Jews to sustain a strong community.

Some think that the realm of the sacred will redeem the failings of the secular. The numbers of those who follow the path of the Torah are growing rapidly; they are to be seen on the streets of Outremont, Snowdon and Thornhill. The Canadian Jewish community, therefore, will survive, though possibly in altered form.

What is clear is that its history from 1921 to the present — centring on the themes of anti-Semitism, the Holocaust, Zionism and integration — has been influenced by domestic and international events. These elements for understanding Jewish history have never been sufficient, for Judaism exists in time as well as in space. These coordinates of the culture which Jews brought continue to add to the context of Canada.

Over the past 70 years, the interplay between Jewish culture and Canadian context has fostered an advancement and an enrichment for both. Jews have added an echo of their chant eternal to the Canadian chorus and have received in return the ample rewards of peace, freedom and opportunity in a generous land. It might be said that if until 1921 Canadian Jewry was taking root, it would be entirely reasonable to conclude that from then until 1994 that same community was branching out.

Gerald Tulchinsky is a professor of History at Queen's University, Kingston, Ont. He is the author of Taking Root: The origins of the Canadian Jewish Community, Lester Publishing Limited, 1992.

Opinions

After Rabin's murder

"Confidence measures are obviously required, currently far less urgently between Israelis and Arabs than between Israelis themselves. And since the government has the power, the ball is in its court."

By Emil Fackenheim

The Ramat Gan suicide bus bombing occurred in July. My response, in the Sept. 14 issue of The Canadian Jewish News, contained the above two sentences. Little did I know how speedily, devastatingly, the first would be confirmed and the second refuted. On the first, not a further word need be said. As for the second, to be sure, the ball for taking the needed measures continues to be in the government court, for it does have the power. But — as is now revealed, to the shock of the world, not just to its Jewish component — it is not in its court alone: that judgment of mine was erroneous. Power rests also with such Jews as express their citizenship in Israel by murdering its leaders. Nor is that power negligible: the consequences of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin are unforeseeable.

In making that error I was not alone. The critics of the Oslo Accord failed to distinguish — as frequently, forcefully, consistently as, in retrospect, was necessary — between opposition by "ballot" and opposition by "bullet." (Benjamin Netanyahu's apt expression.) As for the government forces, they failed to give sufficient attention to security measures; there may even have been outright negligence. And Rabin himself erred in refusing to wear the bullet-proof vest that might have saved his life.

Shall we think of him as criminally negligent? Or do we not serve both truth and his memory better by thinking of him as filled with Ahavat Israel (love of the Jewish people)? Enough of it to believe that such a thing — a Jew murdering the prime minister of the Jewish state, won after bi-millennial statelessness — is impossible? And perhaps charity bids us extend that thought to the contending parties also. They too must have been sure that this particular crime just could not happen in the Jewish state.

In the months to come, both right and left will have to do much thinking about the difference between loyal and criminal opposition and between free speech and incitement to violence: this, and also, perhaps, some legislating. But hatred between Jew and Jew can be cured only by "love of the Jewish people." But what is Ahavat Israel?

I will not attempt a definition but give a test case, unheard of prior to our century: the head of a Judenrat. At the extreme Israeli left, love for Jews exists, if at all, only indirectly, insofar as they are members of mankind-in-general. ("The Holocaust was not a case of Nazis murdering Jews but of people murdering people.") The other extreme, the Kahanist right, not satisfied with merely excluding the Judenrat head from the love due to Jews by Jews, is wont to add insult to his unique — uniquely Jewish — injuries. But Ahavat Israel, a Jewish virtue at all times, does not pass the test of our time, unless it includes such as Adam Czerniakow.

Head of the Warsaw Ghetto Judenrat, Czerniakow was not a religious Jew. Administering as he did Nazi regulations, he was not, by the normal secular Jewish standards, a good Jew either. And since, after three years at this post, he died by self-administered poison, not battling the SS, gun in hand, nor, weaponless and unresisting, tortured by them, he was neither a hero nor a martyr.

Yet, in a way hitherto nonexistent and unknown, Czerniakow was both. Had his been an ordinary life, it would presumably have been average in courage, average in decency and unremarkable. As it was, he found himself at a post implicating him in the Nazi crimes against his own people. Why did he stay at that post, endure it, administer those foul regulations for three interminable years? It was in the attempt, sporadically successful, to lessen the grimness of the lot of the many by handing over the few. What made him, eventually, stop? (The poison had been available all along.) His last note says it: They wanted him "to kill the children with his own hands."

This Czerniakow refused to do. Then he did what was left. At once hero and martyr, defeating the SS and victorious over Treblinka, he ended his life.

Raul Hilberg, editor of The Warsaw Diary of Adam Czerniakow, comments:

"The survival of the children was the ultimate test of his efforts in the Ghetto ... He stood at the helm and died with his people."

The Warsaw Ghetto Judenrat head and his people were at one in death. Only if our Ahavat Israel is strong enough, pure enough to encompass them can it be strong enough, pure enough, after so much groundless hatred, to make us one again for life. On learning of Czerniakow's death, Warsaw Ghetto diarist Chaim Kaplan wrote:

"He did not have a good life, but he had a beautiful death ... There are those who earn immortality in a single hour. The President Adam Czerniakow earned his immortality in a single instant."

The perils of moral blindness

I was shocked to hear that the slogan "The Rabbis are murderers!" was scrawled on the Chief Rabbinate building in Jerusalem. In the minds of many secular Israelis, Yitzhak Rabin's assassin, Yigal Amir, represents the Jewish religious world-view devoid of tolerance or respect for those who do not share its faith commitments. Rabbinic leadership is denounced for sanctioning a spiritual and political outlook which is irreconcilable with democracy and pluralism.

By David Hartman

The crucial issue is not what individual rabbis actually believe. In Israel's present social climate, Judaism is equated with fanaticism, intolerance and fundamentalism. Secular intellectuals portray Halachah as the main obstacle to establishing a healthy, democratic society where Jews and Arabs, the religious and the secular, can live peacefully and harmoniously.

It is painful to see the demonization of Rabin being followed by the demonization of anyone who wears a kippah or is loyal to the Torah heritage. Those who now vilify the religious community are guilty of creating an atmosphere of dehumanization which can also lead to violence.

Secularism doesn't guarantee tolerance just as religion doesn't guarantee intolerance. Bullets can be shot from left to right just as easily as from right to left. No group, regardless of political ideology, is immune to the barbaric consequences of dehumanizing one's opponent.

The religious community has undergone a deep trauma. Yigal Amir, Rabin's assailant went to good schools where he received the type of education which was the pride of religious Zionism.

Yet, here is a young man, a product of this celebrated educational system, who feels no regret, no sense of guilt, not an ounce of shame or remorse for having committed murder. He is firmly convinced that his religious tradition fully validates his actions and that Rabin - an archenemy of Judaism and the Jewish people - halachically deserved to be killed.

The religious community must ask itself: Does Torah education create moral revulsion to murder and violence, or does it undermine the moral worth of people who do not share its faith convictions? Religious education must look seriously at its texts and traditions and ask: Do these words encourage violence against the stranger and the so-called "heretic"?

If I believed that loyalty to classical Judaism led to moral blindness, I would cease being an Orthodox Jew. I deeply believe that the Torah, understood in its best light, educates towards the sanctity of life and revulsion to murder. "Shedding innocent blood defiles the Land and drives off the Divine Presence." (Sifre 161)

Nevertheless, I realize that there are statements in the Bible and in the Talmud which - in themselves - can mistakenly lead to fanaticism and intolerance. Every historical tradition is in need of interpretation and must provide mechanisms for its self-correction. Judaism must be filtered through the critical consciousness of moral human beings. The Jewish tradition must be (and always was) mediated by teachers who had a profound reverence for human life. Many great Torah scholars were not embarrassed to bring independent standards of moral judgment to their reading of sacred texts. They realized that the Talmud - uninterpreted - is dangerous, and the Bible - uninterpreted - is dangerous. The tradition educates towards morality only if it is seen through the eyes of morally healthy individuals.

To those individuals who feel enraged by Rabin's murder and turn away from Judaism out of a sense of moral revulsion, I say: Please don't abandon the discussion. Please don't give up on our heritage. We have no other.

Don't give up on the tradition because of what some individual Jews have become. Decent people from all camps must join ranks and challenge the tradition to rediscover its healthy interpretive spirit. In the past, we knew how and when to reinterpret those sacred texts which violated our moral sensibilities. Today, we must rediscover this vitality and boldness.

If, however, decent human beings give up on the tradition, then the energy and resources needed for such a renewal will be lost. I therefore appeal to all Jews: Bring your moral criticism into the beit midrash. Let the house of learning resound with the voices of morally alert and concerned human beings.

If these voices will be heard, the text will speak out in new ways. If not, it will cease being a live option for the majority of Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora.

The Sharansky experience

"Do not judge the bottle, but rather its content." The old Jewish adage came to mind when I listened to and observed Natan Sharansky during his recent appearance at Holy Blossom Temple.

By Rabbi. Gunther Plaut

He is a small man when measured with a yardstick, but a very tall man when it comes to spirit and action. Meeting him again was for me a renewal of hope, and I know that his large audience felt the same way, even though many of them could not understand him very well. No matter. The deafening applause which greeted him already spelled it out: People wanted to be in the presence of a modern-day Jewish hero.

As I was listening to him, the picture of another such meeting flashed through my mind. I was transported back to Music Hall in Cincinnati some 58 years ago.

The speaker was Thomas Mann, Nobel laureate for literature, staunch opponent of the Nazis .

Mann spoke in German, and I was sure that the great majority of those in attendance did not understand a word of what he was saying, or anyway, very little of it. It did not matter. They had come to be in the presence of greatness, and they sat quietly for more than an hour of his address.

So it was with Sharansky. He spoke quickly, punctuating his sentences with generous gestures. But his accented English was not easily understood, even though in one-to-one talk he has no problem in communicating. He is charming; his eyes twinkle; he has an easy laugh — and his audience was captivated by him.

What he said was not new; his own book told much of the story. But it is one thing to read it and another to see and hear the man himself. There he was, taking us back to the days of his imprisonment.

He was totally at the mercy of the KGB, yet getting the better of his jailers. He was a prisoner, an exile, cut off from family and friends, threatened, humiliated and terrorized — yet it was he, Natan Sharansky, prisoner of Zion, who was the one who was truly free. He laughed at his tormentors and their government, while they dared not laugh. He spoke his mind; they could not speak theirs. In the end, he prevailed against all odds. They had power only over the weak and they cringed in the face of strength.

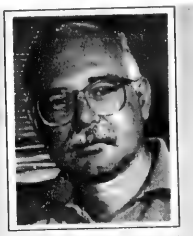
Sharansky is now physically free as well, and their power has collapsed in the ruins of the Soviet empire. As he related his experience, he seemed to grow taller and taller.

He is a force in today's Israel as well, especially in view of the enormous impact which recent Russian immigration has had. His newly formed party will rely heavily, though not exclusively, on this latest wave of immigrants who are already transforming the face of Israel. They are, to a significant extent, highly educated, artistic, cultured and creative. Sharansky compared their aliyah to the second and third waves of settlers at the beginning of the century. They too came from Russia and they provided the leadership for the yishuv and, later, the state. So it will be this time too, he predicted. The newcomers will give Israel a new cadre of tomorrow's leadership and will help to return the land to some of its old ideals.

In a time of national sorrow, Sharansky brought us a sense of hope and confidence.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...



By Sheldon Kirshner

Variety is the spice of life, and judging by the latest batch of books of Jewish interest, publishers seem to think so too.

Let's begin with the Middle East, a region that has produced its fair share of commentary.

The Middle East Military Balance (Westview Press, $89.50 US) is a specialist's volume, but the average reader will have no trouble plumbing its depths. The first segment, consisting of seven essays, surveys strategic developments. The rest of the book — which is edited by Shlomo Gazit and published by the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University — is given over to a description and analysis of the area's armies. All in all, a trenchant piece of work.

Water is the staff of life, and in the parched Middle East, this is particularly true. Joyce Shira Starr's Covenant Over Middle Eastern Waters (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $34.95) authoritatively delves into this relatively obscure but essentially important topic.

Economics may determine the fate of Israel's peace agreement with the PLO. If the ordinary Palestinian on the street does not reap the dividends of peace, it may flounder. Securing Peace in the Middle East (MIT Press, no price listed) addresses this critical issue by unveiling a cohesive plan for an integrated Middle East economy. The contributors are Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians, as well as Americans from Harvard and the Massachussets Institute of Technology (MIT).

You don't have to be a maven to know that Iraq is a police state. But if you're short of details, consult Human Rights in Iraq (Yale University Press, $35 US), a searing indictment of that country's lamentable record.

There was a long preparatory period before the United States and its allies launched the 1991 Gulf War. In the run-up to it, there were fierce debates within the American military about tactics and strategy. The Generals' War: The Inside Story of the Conflict in the Gulf (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $36.95) reveals the behind-the-scenes manoeuvering and infighting. The authors, Michael Gordon and Bernard Trainor, display a great breadth of knowledge.

Victor Ostrovsky is back again. Four years after writing By Way of Deception, a comparatively plausible account of the Mossad, he has written The Other Side of Deception (HarperCollins, $33.75). This one, a kind of sequel, is just as controversial but hardly as interesting.

Chaya Bernstein's imaginative primer, Our Land of Israel (UAHC Press, $12 US), is tailor-made for children between the ages of nine and 12. Replete with text, drawings, photographs and games, it is a window into the nature of Israeli society.

Claudia Cornwall, a Vancouver journalist, was baptized as an Anglican. So imagine her surprise when she learned that her Austrian family was of Jewish origin. Letter From Vienna (Douglas & McIntyre, $26.95), with a foreward by Holocaust scholar Raul Hilberg, is a poignant exploration of Cornwall's search to unearth her Jewish heritage.

Fifth columnists emerge in every war. In Britain, almost 200 pro-Nazi traitors were apprehended. William Joyce (Lord Haw-Haw) was the most notorious of the lot. But, as Adrian Weale expertly demonstrates in Renegades — Hitler's Englishmen (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $32.95), Joyce was merely the tip of a treacherous iceberg.

Newspaper aficionados will enjoy Behind The Times (Villard, $32), Edwin Diamond's engaging dissection of life on the New York Times, owned and largely managed by Jews.

The Filenes of Boston. The Strausses and Gimbels of New York. The Riches of Atlanta. They were among an elite group of Jewish department store proprietors who changed the face of mass merchandising in the United States. In Merchant Princes (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $21.95), Leon Harris — the grandson of one such clan — traces their rise from street peddling to the pinnacle of wealth and respectability.

Fascism in France did not develop in an intellectual vacuum. David Carroll's French Literary Fascism (Princeton University Press, no price listed) elucidates this thesis by examining the writings of eight far-right intellectuals, from Maurice Barres to Paul de Man. A revealing but rigorously academic tome.

The following works of enduring fiction are out in new paperback editions, published by Schocken: The Castle and The Trial by Franz Kafka; The Periodic Table by Primo Levi; and From The Kingdom Of Memory and The Forgotten by Elie Wiesel.

Can anyone really describe the hell that was Auschwitz? Otto Friedrich makes a remarkable effort in The Kingdom of Auschwitz (HarperCollins, $11.50), which blends fact with poetic observations.

The Warsaw Ghetto is a symbol of both despair and valor. In A Surplus of Memory (University of California Press, $35 US), Yitzhak (Antek) Zuckerman, a leader of the 1943 uprising, describes with searing precision the hardships, the revolt and the aftermath. In Courage Under Siege (Oxford University Press, $42), Charles Roland offers a compelling account of starvation, disease and death in the doomed ghetto.

Alan Rosenbaum, an American philosophy professor, believes that war criminals should be brought to justice. In Prosecuting Nazi War Criminals (Westview Press, $34.95 US), Rosenbaum cogently explains why this task is such a moral imperative.

Mordecai Richler's racy reflections on his Zionist youth and on his odyssey in Israel, This Year in Jerusalem (Random House, $27.50), brim with nostalgia, wit and concern.

Volumes for the mind and for the eye

Coffee-table books are supposed to inform with their layers of knowledge and to impress with their artistry.

Two recent publications, The Jews and Europe: 2,000 Years of History and A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People: From the Time of the Patriarchs to the Present, do just that.

These are volumes for the mind and the eye, engrossing us with enviable erudition and lavish illustrations.

As such, they make perfect holiday gifts.

The Jews and Europe (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $73.95) is nothing if not ambitious in scope. The authors, Elena Romero Castello and Uriel Macias Kapon, seem to miss nothing.

They trace the Jewish people's encounter with the Greeks, the first Europeans to have contact with the Jews. They write of the dispersions which created the Diaspora, of the autonomous status Jews enjoyed in the Roman Empire, of the first anti-Semitic edicts, of Muslim rule in Spain, of Charlemagne's relationship with his Jewish subjects, of the Crusades, and of the impact of the Black Death plague on Jews.

As they delve deeper, Castello and Kapon examine the expulsion of Jews from various European countries, the satanization of Judaism, and the lives of Sephardim in the Ottoman Empire.

Much more is yet to come — the false messiah syndrome (as exemplified in Shabbetai Zevi), the reign of tolerance in Holland, the state of Jewish existence in Germanic Europe and the Russian Empire, the development of Chassidism and the dawn of emancipation.

Castillo and Kapon also study the impact of the 1917 Russian Revolution on Jewish society, the spread of Zionism as a reaction to anti-Semitism, and finally, the biggest disaster to befall Jews, the Holocaust.

In the second part of their book, they focus on religion, rites, customs, festivals, the high holy days, traditional garments, cuisine, synagogue architecure, art, music, cinema, Hebrew and Yiddish and philosophy.

The Jews and Europe is greatly enlivened with full-color paintings, drawings and photographs, reproduced to the highest standard.

The second volume under review, A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People (Random House, $42), is edited by Eli Barnavi.

Despite the inevitable overlapping, readers will not feel they are covering old ground. The detailed maps ensure a sense of freshness.

Abraham's migration to Ur notwithstanding, the principal events which unfold here include the exodus from Egypt, the trials and tribulations of the ancient Israelites, the Babylonian dispersal, the brush with Hellenism and the Roman conquest of Palestine.

Further along are accounts of the Jews of Byzantium, the formation of the Diaspora, the uneasy coexistence between Jews and Christians, and the Crusader empire in Palestine. In this connection, readers will be interested to learn that two of the Crusaders' forts were called Montreal and Mirabell.

In addition, there are chapters on so-called new Christians, East European Jewry and American Jewry, as well as sections devoted to Jewish life in the Habsburg Empire, Latin America, India, China, Ethiopia and Muslim lands.

Also coming under scrutiny are such topics as modern anti-Semitism and the resurrection of the Jewish state.

The maps, the key to unlocking the panoramic vastness of this atlas, are concise and admirably clear. Moreover, they are supplemented by relevant photographs, posters, paintings and drawings.

The power of words

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI MICHAEL WOLFF

During the past few months, I have been teaching in an adult education program on the subject of mentshlechkeit. One of the topics we discussed was the concept of keeping one's word, the notion that if somebody promised to do something then they had to stay true to their words.

The idea behind the premise of keeping one's word in Jewish law is that the words one expresses are the indication of the wishes of the individual. One's words have great power and the ability to keep one's words determine the individual's credibility.

Words in Jewish law have a reality all their own. They are the expression of the intention preceding an action. They are also the prelude to future action. Words can accomplish great good and they can also cause harm.

In this week's Torah portion of Vayishlach in Genesis Ch. 33, Jacob has a reconciliation with his brother Esau. Jacob in Verse 14 makes a promise to Esau to join him in Seir. Jacob does not fulfil his promise. The midrash points out that Jacob is punished because of his empty words and that an opportunity to do good, to reform Esau, was lost as a result of words left unfulfilled. Here we can see the potential power of words. One should not say things that one does not mean.

Ethics of our Fathers also teaches us about the use of words. In Ch. 3, Mishneh 17, Rabbi Akiva says that "a fence for wisdom is silence." This means that a person who takes more time to think about what he is saying decreases the possibility of making a thoughtless mistake.

Avtalyon in Ch. 1:11 of Ethics of the Fathers warns that ill-conceived words can lead to what Samson Raphael Hirsch terms "moral manslaughter." Teachings which can be misinterpreted can lead to endangerment of life and to the disintegration of basic morality.

I think that beyond the basic shock at the death of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and the concern about peace in the Middle East, the Jewish community is also reeling from the shame of a Jewish assassin justifying his actions by the ill-conceived, poorly formulated and vitriolically communicated words of a religious authority.

If people, myself included, thought more judiciously about their use of words, perhaps such terrible events could have been avoided.

As the saying goes: "Better to be thought a fool and stay silent than to open one's mouth and remove all doubt."

Guard your tongue

PART 2 OF 2

When we raise our disagreements to the level of slanderous name-calling, we invite our own destruction. As the children and grandchildren of Holocaust survivors, how can we now face the few remaining survivors or, if deceased, our relatives in the next world when, after Auschwitz, a Jew can even think of using heinous language against another Jew, whether from the left or right, whether with or without a kipa on his head, whether before or after Rabin's murder? Did over six million really die for nothing? Do we still refuse to learn? At the very least, we who were spared the Holocaust must carefully consider every word before it leaves our mouths, not only in political debate, but — and let's be honest — where we are more likely to fail: within our immediate families.

I have seen more Jewish divorces than I would care to count result from an in-law who refused to withhold scornful criticism to their married child about the child's spouse; too many insensitive souls who insult their spouses or belittle their children with hurtful language; too much gossip. The secular and rabbinical courts are crowded with the consequences of missed opportunities to withhold one's tongue and act with tact. And I'm the only one who profits. You don't have to be in my business to realize that the rate of assimilation of Jewish children of divorced or alienated parents is higher than children from traditional families that live in shalom.

So the next time you are tempted to call your wife an idiot or tell your child that he's stupid or complain about your elderly parent's eccentric behaviour, remember what happened to Rabin. Remember it in your home; remember it in the synagogue; remember it when you light your Chanukah candles. Let its lesson not be lost on you. Murderous language leads to discord and, sometimes, murder itself. If you catch yourself and find a more peaceful and menschlech mode of self-expression, then such exemplary conduct will be part of Rabin's true memorial: the preservation of your Jewish family and ultimately, the Jewish community.

Shalom.

'We need peace for ourselves'

By MILTON HARRIS
Special to The CJN

Leah Rabin asked a rally for her murdered husband where the "silent majority" was when Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin needed them. We have to ask our community leadership the same question.

Where was our leaders' public support for the peace policies of the Rabin government? Where were those countless Jewish leaders who, when the Likud was in power, were quick to express their outrage when "peaceniks" like me publicly criticized policies of the "freely-elected" government of Israel?

Where have these leaders been in the last two years while religious and nationalist hardliners mounted, without any compunction, increasingly virulent public attacks on the peace policies of the freely-elected government of Israel and on Rabin himself?

We condemn Yasser Arafat for not publicly censuring Palestinian extremists, but we have not stood up to our own hardliners. Our responsibility is to tell the world that those who oppose the Rabin government's peace policy are only a "noisy minority" in our community.

Of course, for many years I have been an advocate of the right of public dissent in our community. Airing of dissent and openness of policy are essential for maximum public participation, particularly of the younger generation we hope to attract into community affairs.

But those who choose to take issue with Israeli government policy owe it to the rest of us to assert, without any obfuscation, their real objections to the peace agreements.

Can we believe hardline Jewish leaders and rabbis who live here, when they condemn the Rabin government for trading territories for peace because of "security" risks, when Rabin was the chief of staff who planned and executed the conquest of the territories?

Is it credible that the hardliners who live here have greater concern for the safety of Israel than the prime minister who was born in Jerusalem and spent his whole adult life in the public service of the Jewish state?

Guest Voices

Whetting terrorists' appetites

Does anyone really believe Palestinian terrorist acts are aimed only at stopping the peace process and will, somehow, end if peace negotiations are aborted? The terrorists have never won a scintilla of a concession from the Israelis, but success in killing the peace process would only whet their appetite for a renewed effort to achieve their ultimate aim: the destruction of Israel.

Much has been made about not being able to trust Arafat or the PLO. But our trust must be in the overwhelming power of the IDF. No government of Israel will ever allow the demilitarized Palestinian entity to rearm, or agree to remove the Israeli army from the Jordan River line. Nor, in a world of rapidly-advancing military technology, with the United States as the only superpower, can any force be put together in the Middle East to challenge the dominance of the IDF.

So why don't all of the hardliners admit what some have no fear of saying: that the vehement opposition to the "Land of Peace" programs of the Rabin government is based on the religious or nationalist ideology that the land God gave us, that was ruled over by King David, belongs to the Jewish People forever?

Can it be that they are wary their past accusations against "Peaceniks" like me will boomerang on them, that they should refrain from dissent unless they are prepared to move to Israel and live or die with the consequences? Is there any doubt that aborting the peace process would lead to perpetual war with the Palestinians? And that war would be fought by Israelis, not by us.

And, finally, the message that the murdered Rabin has left must be stated over and over again: We — Israelis and Diaspora Jews alike — don't need peace to accommodate the national aspirations of the Palestinians, or to enhance the popularity of Israel in the world, or to gain the approval of our neighbors in the Diaspora.

We need peace to prevent the erosion of the Jewish soul which is the inevitable consequence of long-term occupation of lands primarily inhabited by people of another nationality and faith; we need peace because despite its risks, peace offers the best security for the Zionist State.

We need peace for ourselves.

Jewish view of heavenly sex

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Heavenly Sex: Sexuality in the Jewish Tradition by Dr. Ruth K. Westheimer & Jonathan Mark, New York University Press $22.95 US

What did the Victorian mother usually tell her daughter on the night of her wedding? According to Ruth Westheimer, affectionately known as Dr. Ruth by her host of admirers, and her co-author, Jonathan Mark, editor of Jewish Week, the advice was: "Grit your teeth and think of England."

But in the Jewish tradition, they assert, the matter of sexual satisfaction was written into the marriage contract. Under the wedding canopy, a groom promises his bride that he will provide her with food, shelter and sexual gratification. They maintain that in Judaism, "the holiest men are required to marry. Celibacy is not a virtue — orgasms are."

Someone once joked that Jews are too busy having children to bother about sex. But Judaism, the authors insist, regards the purpose of sex as more than just procreation. Properly considered, it is even a spiritual act. Maimonides taught that "When sexual congress is performed for the sake of heaven, there is nothing so holy or pure ... God did not create anything that is ugly or shameful. If the sexual organs are said to be shameful, how can it be said that the Creator fashioned something blemished?"

The mystical Zohar daringly suggests that after the destruction of the Jerusalem Temple, "the bedroom in each home was considered as an aspect of the once-glorious and sanctified Holy of Holies."

Focusing largely on Orthodox Judaism, the authors escort the reader on a lively tour of sexuality and its relationship to religion and culture: eroticism in the Hebrew Scriptures and Talmud, prohibited behavior, the special role of the Sabbath, the function of the mikvah and the nature of the wedding ceremony. Heavenly Sex conveys information — among other subjects — on courtship, fertility, rape and seduction. To all of this varied material, Dr. Ruth brings the wisdom of Jewish tradition, her own experience as a world renowned therapist and an unfailing fund of humor and good taste.

About homosexuality, they make clear that for traditional Jews, for whom the Torah's every word is the word of God, there can be no acceptance or approval. This, unhappily, leaves Orthodox Jews within the closet, unable to take their place freely or honestly in society. Non-traditional forms of Judaism approach the entire complex question in a more liberal fashion.

Among pious Jewish men there is a taboo against socializing with women and a fear of even limited bodily contact. This has led to the witticism, "Why is adultery prohibited? Because it might lead to mixed dancing." For ultra-traditional Jews, proper dancing is what happens at weddings, where men dance with men in a wide circle and women dance with women.

In discussing the problems associated with sexual guilt, the authors point out that in the Jewish tradition, it refers only to action not to thought or fantasy. "It is useful to remind Orthodox patients that God's Torah is remarkably forgiving to sexual weaknesses, lapses, and deviations, as we see from the stories of Judah and Tamar, David and Bathsheva, Lot's daughters and dozens of others. We may fail at times and make a mess of things, but as any parent or grandparent knows, to those we have given life there is a bottomless reservoir of love and second chances. And the tradition never fails to remind us that it is God who has given us life."

Peace in the home is a paramount Jewish goal. It is unquestionably related to wholesome sexuality. As the Talmud teaches, if a man and woman are truly lovers, they can make their bed on the edge of a sword; if their love goes bad, the best bed in the world is not big enough.

Both instructive and entertaining, this work is enriched by two appendices that enumerate biblical and rabbinic laws concerning sexuality and a glossary of biblical themes and references to the subject.

FAMILY TORAH DEDICATION

Over 200 community leaders, rabbis and loved ones gathered last week for the dedication of a family Torah at Toronto's Kehillat Shaarei Torah Synagogue. Holding the Torah in the centre is Dino (David) Barda, whose 95-year-old father, Cavaliere Isacco Barda of Rome, commissioned the new scroll, penned in Israel in Sephardi script. Former mayor was active in the Jewish community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judge Philip Givens, former mayor of Toronto, died last Thursday night of a heart attack. He was 73.

The Toronto-born criminal lawyer worked his way up the ranks of municipal politics and was elected mayor in 1963, a position he held until 1966.

An art lover, he was probably best known for bringing Henry Moore's The Archer to the square outside the new City Hall. Unable to get government funds to purchase the controversial sculpture, he raised the money from private sources.

Later he served in the provincial and federal legislatures as a member of the Liberal party.

He was on the Metro police commission for over 10 years and was its chair in the early 1980s.

After leaving the police commission, Givens worked as a judge in the provincial court.

Throughout his life, he was also active in the Jewish community.

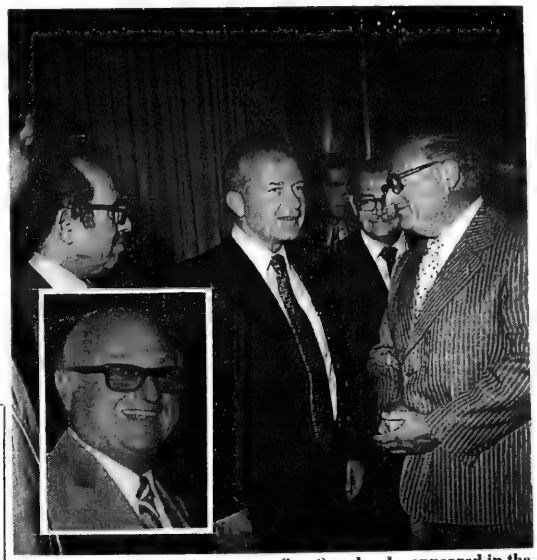
He was founding president of the Upper Canada Lodge of B'nai Brith; national president of the Canadian Zionist Federation for 12 years; chair of the United Jewish Welfare Fund; and national chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national committee on Yiddish.

Givens received the national humanitarian award of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Until very recently, he taught Yiddish through the committee on Yiddish and regularly gave lectures on current affairs in Yiddish at Baycrest Terrace.

An obviously shaken Max Schecter, a close friend who spoke to The CJN on behalf of the family, reminisced that until very recently, Givens had enjoyed attending a monthly Yiddish conversation club.

Among the dignitaries at the funeral were Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall, former Metro chair Paul Godfrey, and past and current Metro police chiefs Bill McCormick and David Boothby.



Phil Givens seen in his later years (inset) and as he appeared in the late 1960s hosting Yitzhak Rabin in Toronto.

A police honor guard accompanied the funeral.

CJC president Goldie Hershon expressed "great sadness" over Givens' passing.

In 1993, he was part of a CJC delegation to the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. CJN quoted him at the time as saying, "It was worth going to Poland just to hear [Polish President Lech] Walesa apologize to the Jewish people."

Nevertheless, he said that he would not go again, since "Anti-Semitism is alive and well there."

Then-CJC president Irving Abella said in a media release that "the trip was important for him because of his great sense of the Jewish past and Yiddish culture."

As Givens had requested, his coffin was draped with the Canadian and Israeli flags. The funeral was held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue on Sunday.

Givens is survived by his wife Min, children Michael and Eleanor, and two grandchildren.

AFTER RABIN... will peace survive?

"I was a soldier for 27 years. I fought as long as there was no prospect of peace. I believe that there is now a chance for peace, a great chance, which must be seized."

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin

Israel is at a crossroads. A meaningful peace is within its reach. But there are strong forces which oppose the continuation of the peace process. PEACE NOW in Israel has played a vital role in promoting peace and security.

In the coming year, Israelis will make a most fundamental choice: they can move towards a more secure and prosperous future or they can risk the ongoing cycle of wars and the demoralizing nature of the occupation. PEACE NOW is the largest grassroots movement in Israel working for peace. It needs our support.

Community Matters

Leaders applaud community as UJA campaign closes

Jews taking care of Jews. That's one of Charles Gold's most impressive memories of the 1996 UJA Campaign, which formally closed on December 6.

Gold, his fellow Campaign co-chair Carol Kassel and Women's Campaign chairperson Marlene Axmith paid tribute to members of Toronto's Jewish community for making UJA's most innovative fundraising drive so successful.

This was the first time UJA sought pledges not only for the upcoming year, but for each of the following two years as well. The Three Year Vision Campaign was, according to Kassel, "very risky," but "the enthusiasm of volunteers and so many people willing to do whatever was necessary, turned this into a fantastic Campaign."

Over 40% of contributors have pledged for three years, providing a total of more than $63 million so far.

Gold thinks the Campaign's high point occurred even before it officially began, "when we realized we had the philanthropic leadership behind The Three Year Vision."

"The concept of The Three Year Vision really revitalized a lot of the canvassers," said Marlene Axmith. "Canvassing became easier and we had many more knowledgeable fundraisers."

Axmith also credits the community launch in September with giving the Campaign a big boost. About 1,000 people turned out for a live theatrical performance and the debut of UJA's Campaign film.

The three leaders travelled together this summer on a fact finding mission to Kiev and Israel - a mission which, for Kassel, "reinforced a feeling of pride in our community and the way in which it was helping the Jewish Agency to get Jews out of the former Soviet Union."

When the delegation visited disadvantaged men and women in their tiny Kiev apartments who are being assisted by UJA contributions, "it made us realize what each and every dollar does," said Axmith.

At home, deep government budget cuts have placed unprecedented pressure on agencies supported by UJA. "The impact of cutbacks bolstered my resolve," Axmith stressed. "They made both this year's Campaign and the Three Year Vision more urgent," added Kassel.

Looking ahead, UJA will be concentrating on encouraging Campaign participation by non-contributors, reaching out to different communities within the Jewish community, promoting Jewish unity and developing stronger relationships with donors.

UJA promised not to canvass contributors who made three year pledges until the 1999 Campaign. Three Year Vision subscribers will be invited to participate in events, missions and educational programs.

"Outreach and unity are the two focuses for next year," noted Gold. "We have to look to the next generation."

Although the campaign is officially over for 1996, UJA canvassers will continue working to contact members of the community who have yet to make a donation decision.

Everybody pitched in. Here, BBYO representatives present a larger than life cheque to Charles Gold and Carol Kassel.

The Campaign couldn't get along without volunteers like the ever-present Fay Gold, a fixture at UJA telethons.

Prominent speakers highlight unity telethons

Hundreds of canvassers will be calling for unity next week as UJA's CommUNITY telethons get underway.

With 7,000 contributors to call, Campaign organizers are asking all segments of Toronto's Jewish community to join together to help other Jews all over the world.

UJA hopes that the CommUNITY telethons will attract those who, so far, have been less involved in the Campaign. A special effort is being made to recruit volunteers living south of St. Clair and north of Steeles.

Guest speakers will be discussing unity at each shift.

- Rabbis Mark Dratch and Erwin Schild will be talking about Unity Through Goodness and Tzedakah.
- Provincial Deputy Minister Elaine Todres will present her views on How Others See Us as a Community.
- Sephardic community leader Maurice Benzacar will speak about Community from the Perspective of the Newcomer.
- Miri Gur from the Israel Aliya Centre will discuss Israel and the Jewish World.
- Shira Herzog will offer her analysis of Israel Today and the Challenge of Unity.
- Rosalie Flomen of Jewish Women's Federation will talk about The Unifying Force of UJA.

Dr Harry Krakowsky, co-chair of UJA's Community Cabinet thinks that the CommUNITY telethon is important because "no matter who ends up benefiting from the money, everyone must work together to raise the funds."

To register for a telethon shift call Cindy Bogach at (416) 635-2883 ext. 190.

Community Matters

It's all about reaching out

Outreach is the password as the UJA Women's Campaign seeks to broaden its legion of volunteers and contributors.

UJA Women's Campaign Chair Marlene Axmith says "outreach is one of our most important priorities."

The Young Women's Outreach Committee, chaired by Natalie Storm Kirsh, is planning a series of educational programs for next year to help recruit 28-38 year olds.

Many young Jewish women, Kirsh pointed out, are the daughters of mothers who have been very active in UJA and other organizations and have decided to follow in their footsteps. "I'm here because I grew up with it," she said. Her mother, Francie Storm, has been involved with UJA for 25 years and is currently Vice President of Human Resources Development for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Outreach is a good way for young women who want to get more involved in the Jewish community, to get their foot in the door," said Committee member Dr. Deborah Kestenbaum.

Kestenbaum thinks the time is right for her to become involved after a few years of communal inactivity since leaving university.

Only three of the Young Women's Outreach Committee members bring previous community or campaign experience to their positions.

The four educational sessions scheduled are:

- The Challenge of Raising a Mensh: Teaching our Children Values, with consultants Sarah Landy and Barbara Miller.
- The Fifth Question: How Can I Make This Pesach Different from All Others, featuring Judy Urowitz, who will discuss creative ways to personalize and enhance the Seder.
- Entering the Art Market: A Guide for the Neophyte, with art dealer Carol Tanenbaum.
- Jewish Geography: A Walking Tour Through Old Jewish Toronto.

The UJA Women's Campaign raises about $4 million a year - over 10% of the general campaign total. For more information, call (416) 631-5704.

Star studded tzedakah

A new UJA program is putting a fresh face on gift giving.

The Tzedakah All Stars was originated by Elizabeth Erlich, a mother of four, who discovered how meaningful it was for her children to donate one of the presents they received during a birthday party. Erlich and her kids took one unopened gift each time to Jewish Family & Child Service for distribution to agency clients.

"It was something that our children really understood," she explained. "It was more meaningful than just putting money in a tzedakah box."

Erlich approached UJA earlier this year about expanding the concept to Jewish schools and the community. Presentations were made to school principals and the presidents of parents associations and, according to Erlich, "we had support from across the board."

"It was something so pure and simple that everyone thought it was great," she added.

The next step was getting drop off boxes into Jewish schools and one central location. The boxes are now available for children to contribute unopened presents on Mondays only at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Netivot Hatorah, all Associated and United Synagogue Day School branches and the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Erlich hopes for participation by other schools in the new year. All gifts will be given to JF&CS.

Children who contribute presents are being asked to fill out an information form so they can be sent a certificate of appreciation as a participant in the Tzedakah All Star Team and a Junior UJA Club membership card. The card will entitle them to participate in special events throughout the year.

UJA'S Tzedakah All Star initiative, a first for North America, is not, said Erlich, a toy drive. "It's an ongoing program," she stressed. "At the time of their birthdays, children should try to think of someone else. Whenever children receive a lot, they should share a little."

Elizabeth (second from left) Leora, Aviva and Ilana Erlich are the first Tzedakah All Stars.

For further information or to become a Tzedakah All Star volunteer, call Chaia Berkowitz at (416) 631-5690.

UJA launches news for kids

UJA's first newsletter for children is being distributed this week in Toronto's Jewish schools.

The publication, junior UJA news, includes three custom designed cartoon characters, an illustration in which the characters are hidden for readers to find and a maze demonstrating how UJA contributions help others. It also contains an application form for membership in the Junior UJA Club. Members are being invited to a Chanukah party at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, Sunday, Dec. 17, 2-3 p.m. Other "members only" events are being planned for 1996.

"This newsletter is an important marketing innovation for us," said UJA Campaign Director Ted Sokolsky. "We want to reach out to every significant segment of our community and, most importantly, we want to develop early affiliations with UJA."

In addition to junior UJA news, United Jewish Appeal also publishes a newsletter for young adults, called in T.O.

Seniors set the stage

Bathurst Jewish Centre seniors are taking to the stage for UJA.

The fundraising concert on Dec. 12, featuring singer Marvin Rosenshein, is sold out. The evening will also include performances by Teme Kernerman's Chai Dancers, The Habima Players, directed by Minabelle Haneford and the Shalom Singers, conducted by Esther Ghan Firestone, with piano accompaniment by Mikhael Khinkis. All of the performers belong to Senior Adult Services at the BJC. A collection of art work by seniors will also be on display and door prizes will be presented during the evening.

The concert, which was initiated by the BJC's seniors themselves, will be held Tuesday, Dec. 12 at 1:30 pm at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

For more information contact Teme Kernerman at (416) 636-1880 ext. 364.

Marvin Rosenshein will headline the sold out fundraising concert for UJA.

THE PROMISE: 50 years ago a vow was made by those who had survived the Holocaust to those who had perished, that from Generation To Generation we will never forget!

THE PROBLEM: Revisionists and those who deny the Holocaust took place are more vocal than ever. Unfortunately, living witnesses of the Holocaust who can challenge these revisionists will soon disappear. The continual education of future generations must be ensured.

THE SOLUTION: The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has established The Dan Family Multi-Media Centre. Through interactive computer discs it will teach generations to come the history of the Holocaust. It will fortify our children against the new anti-semitism. And it will represent a permanent record of the Holocaust.

THE QUESTION: Will you become a member of Yad Vashem to help support and finance The Canadian Pavilion for Holocaust Studies, which includes a Multi-Media Centre? It is the best way to educate the world as to what happened over 50 years ago this year.

THE DETAILS: Your membership will be from January to December. We are sending you your renewal now to enable you to join before December 1995 and thus get a Tax Receipt for 1995.

If you wish further information on any of the above programs, please contact our Executive Director, Marilyn Somers at 905-660-6028.

Mazon Canada names new executive-director

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Lori Burke

TORONTO — Lori Burke first heard about Mazon Canada a few years ago, just before she got married.

At a pre-wedding meeting, Burke and her fiance Michael Kleinman were told by their rabbi they could add a mitzvah to their joy by donating a portion of the wedding food costs to Mazon.

"I thought it was wonderful, but I did not picture myself working there," Burke said.

Times have changed and now Burke, 29, finds herself executive director of Mazon at the organization's Toronto head office. She takes over from Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, who shepherded Mazon from its inception in the fall of 1986 until last September.

Burke, who has bachelor degrees in social work and law, came to Mazon after articling with the Office of the Official Guardian (now known as the Office of the Children's Lawyer) and then taking some time off to have a baby.

She was doing volunteer work when she saw an ad for the position.

"The whole philosophy attracted me, the fact they give money non-denominationally," she said.

Burke said she was also enamored by Mazon's linking of charity and simchas and by the anonymous way people benefit from Mazon. Not only does the organization not make a point of publicizing its contributors, the beneficiaries don't know where it comes from. "It's the highest form of charity," she said.

Though Mazon has continually increased its annual allocations to food banks and other groups fighting hunger at the grassroots level, Burke believes there's room for new initiatives.

"One of the things I'm looking at doing is to have a professional initiative," where law firms and other professionals donate a percentage of their costs from holiday parties and Friday afternoon wine and cheese get-togethers, she said.

Another fundraising idea is based on her experience as a mom. Kids often receive "loot bags" worth $10 to $20 that include books, stickers, candy and other treats. Instead, parents will be urged to give part of that money to Mazon and substitute less expensive gifts, perhaps candies and a cookie, she suggested.

Like much of Mazon's approach in the past, these initiatives will be done on a small scale, by word of mouth and through networking.

Burke believes the new initiatives will add to the success of Mazon and will complement its traditional fundraising methods that include the selling place cards and holiday appeals in syangogues.

"To me it's almost ingrained in the Jewish tradition to be responsive ... It's a response that comes from the heart of Judaism," she said.

Since its first allocation in the spring of 1987 to the spring of 1995, Mazon has allocated $702,000 to dozens of Jewish and non-Jewish charitable organizations across Canada that fight hunger at the grass roots level.

Temple honors Crombie

David Crombie

TORONTO — Temple Sinai Brotherhood honored David Crombie as its Humanitarian of the Year at a recent dinner and draw.

The former Toronto mayor has been a member of Parliament, federal cabinet minister of Multiculturalism, Health and Welfare and Northern and Indian Affairs and is currently chair of the Waterfront Regeneration Trust.

In accepting the plaque, Crombie told the almost 300 members of the brotherhood he admires them because they understand the meaning of community.

"A strong community is the crucial, fundamental point of human spirit and enterprise," he said. "It gives roots, identity and support. However, a community has to be created. It does not come knocking at your door.

"When events such as this are held, a community is created. Organizers, tickets sellers — all workers — work together and form a community. The person who gets the benefit of the money raised gains and the person who gives the benefit gains. No matter how old and established a community is, each new generation needs to keep it going."

Money raised from the draw will support youth activities at Temple Sinai. Harvey Atkin was the master of ceremonies and dinner co-chairs were Joel Cadesky and Stan Swartz.

Hundreds to join march

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some 350 Jewish high school students and 50 adults from across Canada are expected to participate in the 1996 March of the Living, a 16-day educational tour of Poland and Israel scheduled to leave April 13.

"Many of the kids who go on this trip are grandchildren of survivors, and some are even children of survivors," says Joan Stevens, coordinator of volunteer services at Toronto's Jewish Family and Child Service. Stevens has been appointed chair of the 1996 March of the Living.

The first march, staged in 1988 to commemorate the 45th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, proved so effective that marches, expanded in scope and with an altered focus, have been held every two years since.

"As much as possible," Stevens says, "the emphasis is on the life of the Jews in Poland instead of on their death."

About 5,000 Jewish youth from some 30 nations will march along the three-kilometre route between Auschwitz and Birkenau, a path thousands of Jewish victims of the Nazis were forced to march.

Lublin, Krakow, Treblinka and many other sites in Poland where Jews lived and died are also expected to be on the itinerary.

Participants are scheduled to be in Poland for Yom Hashoah and in Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Joan Stevens

Many of the adult participants are survivors and educators, ready to answer questions or divulge details of their own personal experiences in the Holocaust.

Students 15 to 19 years of age (in grades 10 to 13) are invited to apply to go on the trip. Although the cost is $3,495, subsidies are available, according to Stevens.

Applicants are requested to submit an essay and attend a personal interview in order to qualify. Those who are accepted are invited to several educational seminars before the trip to equip them with basic knowledge and background information prior to departure.

For further details, contact your local Jewish federation or the United Israel Appeal.

Open a kids' account and wrap up a cool hat, too!

Have you ever had feelings like these around this time of year?

"The holiday season has become so commercial!" "If we give another new toy, it'll just end up broken or left under a bed." "Giving cash is such a cop out."

Maybe you should consider doing some of your shopping at Municipal Trust. Yes, Municipal Trust, instead of a toy store!

Until December 23, 1995, we're offering Special Kids' Gift Account packages designed to teach children the fun and the discipline of saving money.

When you open a Future 1st Rate Savings Account with a minimum deposit of $50, you'll get 2 bonuses your child will love: The very cool "MONEY TALKS" cap pictured above and a Golden Nuggets money bag to save coins in!

While other kids are spending money, yours will be learning the rewards of saving for a worthwhile goal.

Of course, if you want to begin a more intensive investment program to help secure your child's future, you can deposit larger amounts into our new high-interest Serious Saver Account, GICs or invest in Templeton Mutual Funds.

Either way, you'll be giving yourself the warm satisfaction of knowing you've done the right thing for the children in your life.

To give a more rewarding gift, just visit your local Municipal Trust branch and ask us for complete details about our Special Kids' Gift Account.

Paralyzed judge 'living as best I can with ALS'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Justice Sam Filer, a judge of the Ontario Court, general division, spends a lot of time counting his blessings.

Although completely paralyzed except for a muscle in his cheek and some limited eye movement as a result of Amyotropic Lateral Sclerosis (ALS), Filer, 60, is able to concentrate on everything he has in life rather than what he has lost.

A recent recipient of Clarke Institute of Psychiatry Foundation's Courage to Come Back Award, Filer was diagnosed with ALS in 1987 and within a year was using a wheelchair. In 1989, he almost died when his lungs failed and although the attending doctors recommended against placing him on a respirator, his wife, Tony Silberman, insisted they have one surgically connected so he could continue to live.

Filer's only means of communication is to send Morse code impulses through a myoelectric conductor taped to his cheek. The impulses are sent to a computer, voice synthesizer and printout.

In a recent interview at his home, Filer said, "I admit that there was a time when I used to wake up each morning wondering what else I was going to be unable to do, but through Toni's infinite patience, guidance and wisdom, and the love of my four children, I began to focus on those abilities which I still retained, rather than mourn those which I lost."

Despite Filer's disabilities, he works at home three days a week and spends the other two in his judicial chambers. He is also a staunch supporter of civil liberties, human rights, social justice and Jewish community issues. In 1989, he was awarded the Bronfman Medal and that same year, the Canadian Jewish Congress created the Sam N. Filer Award which is given every three years to a person who has demonstrated exemplary service to the Jewish community.

Work, community involvement and human rights are an important part of his life. "It is important to me to continue working and to be involved in the community. I share the same needs as everyone else — to be a productive, contributing member of society and to my chosen profession. I enjoy being in the company of colleagues and friends who I respect and who regard me in terms of what I can do, not what I can't."

Judge Sam Filer

Filer also enjoys going to the theatre, entertaining friends and watching his 8-year-old daughter Jaime play baseball.

Jaime says proudly, "I'm the only one of my friends who gets to ride on her dad's lap all the way through Marineland."

Reflecting on what he has learned since contracting ALS, Filer says, "Above all, love, friendship, faith in God and a feeling of self-worth, no matter how it's derived, are powerful elixirs, particularly when there is no medical treatment available.

"A diagnosis of ALS need not be accompanied by an automatic death sentence. Inexperienced, able-bodied people, whether doctors or not, are not necessarily the best people to determine whether a quadriplegic who cannot speak, eat or breathe without mechanical assistance, can enjoy a meaningful quality of life. I enjoy doing many things with my family and friends. Recognizing my mind-body connection, I don't think of myself as suffering from, a victim of, or dying from ALS. In truth, I'm living as best I can with ALS."

Winter camp set

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three Zionist youth movements are joining forces to run a five-night winter camp for 8-to-16-year-olds from Dec. 24 to 29.

Hashomer Hatzair, which has operated the Muskoka winter camp for the past several years, will be working with Canadian Young Judaea and Habonim-Dror on the unique venture.

Although the groups have had joint programs in the past, this is the first time they are collaborating on this type of project.

"I believe that the existence of a joint winter camp will enrich each of our three youth movements and strengthen the alliance between them," said Yehuda Marle, shaliach for Hashomer Hatzair and himself an alumnus of the youth group in Israel.

He credits his Hashomer Hatzair background with fostering a belief in social justice and brotherhood among nations, as well as a strong Jewish identity.

The winter camp, located in Port Carling at a rented Seventh Day Adventist site, is open to youth movement members and non-members alike.

Activities will include outdoor sports such as hiking, skating, tobogganing and snowshoeing, as well as Israeli folkdancing, arts and crafts, Chanukah celebrations and educational programming with an emphasis on fun.

The educational theme for the five days will be the Relationship between Jews: Right versus Left. "I would like [the campers] to understand the different views, but most importantly, how in a democratic society those rifts should be dealt with," Marle said.

A fee of $330 per child includes transportation and vegetarian cuisine. Camp staff will include a registered nurse.

All three organizations run their own summer camps — Camp Shomria (Hashomer Hatzair), Camp Shalom (Canadian Young Judaea) and Camp Gesher (Habonim-Dror).

As a prosecutor with the U.S. Justice Department's Nazi War Crimes Unit, John Loftus discovered top secret documents revealing that the Nazis he had been assigned to prosecute were working for NATO Intelligence. He exposed the shocking Nazi scandal on an Emmy Award winning segment of 60 Minutes. His newest book exposes the still classified archives of the Holocaust, how Jews have been systematically wire tapped since 1944 and how Israel was set up in the Iran-Contra Affair by George Bush.

After doing an enormous amount of research, Loftus has become one of the most learned, sensational and dynamic speakers exposing Western espionage against U.S. Jews and Israel.

Nothing funny about heartbreak of psoriasis

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There used to be a commercial for a medication to deal with "the heartbreak of psoriasis." The phrase caused a lot of snickers.

Jordan Wagman, 23, knows there is nothing funny about psoriasis. And that there is a lot of heartbreak.

Ten years ago, he woke up with "two huge patches in my hair." The psoriasis spread, until it affected most of his body.

"I would wake up in the morning in a pool of flakes [of skin] and blood. A hot shower was a novelty — when fissures formed, you can't shower, you can't walk, you can't sit."

Over the years he has been hospitalized four times, and underwent treatment with ultra-violet light, drugs and creams.

"It affects my whole life — it's the centre of my life. My daily life, my whole routine revolves around it.

Although Wagman's is one of the more serious examples of psoriasis, (many have it for just short periods of time, or over a small part of the body) he is one of the three per cent of the population that suffers from this chronic skin disease for which the cause is unknown, and there is no cure.

Skin cells reproduce themselves not in a month, as in healthy people, but in three or four days. Treatment is designed to slow down this reproduction.

Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter, founder of the Psoriasis Education and Research Centre at Women's College Hospital, said that it appears to have some genetic component, since it is often seen in several members of the same family, and it is sometimes triggered by an infection (such as strep) or by certain drugs.

Stress makes it worse (Wagman cites as examples ordinary school and teenage experiences, such as exams, puberty and the general growing up angst), as does winter, when the lower humidity leads to drying of the skin.

The psychological problems caused by a chronic, often disfiguring disease are not only serious in themselves, but also make the symptoms worse.

What does appear to help is sunshine. And Wagman has found the place to harness it best — Israel, specifically at the Dead Sea.

Wagman discovered it almost by accident. At the end of his tether, he went to a spa he had heard of at the Dead Sea, where he spent a month, "baking in the sun," as he puts it.

Loath to put his parents to further expense, he took off to Ein Gedi, with a tent, stove and mattress. To his surprise, he discovered he had unwittingly camped just outside a solarium owned by Kibbutz Ein Gedi. For two months, he stayed there, spending seven or eight hours a day in the sun.

"When I left, I was 90 per cent clear. Two weeks later, I was completely clear."

Helen Taylor, nursing director of ambulatory dermatology at Women's College Hospital, explained that because the Dead Sea is the lowest point on earth, the ultra-violet wave length is the longest, and thus both the most effective for psoriasis, and the least likely to cause skin cancer.

To Wagman, though, skin cancer "is the lesser of two evils."

Wagman is so excited about his discovery, that, together with Fisher-Fremont Travel's Bonnie Horowitz, herself the mother of a young woman with psoriasis, he is trying to organize a group tour to the Dead Sea for next April.

Going as a group, he explained, will not only make it more affordable, but will allow greater supervision.

"Even if [the symptoms recede] for one day, five months, or five years, that's something."

Technology centre launched

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — ORT Canada has launched a pilot project in North York that brings a new component to the Toronto-based fundraising group supporting worldwide ORT schools and educational programs.

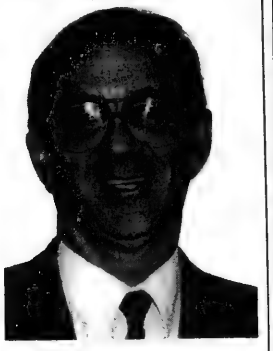
A Creative Technology Centre, set to open at Nelson A. Boylen Collegiate Institute in the fall of 1996, has been established by ORT in partnership with the North York Board of Education, which sent four principals to London last year for training.

The centre, which will provide students with a hands-on opportunity to develop practical computer skills, will serve as a prototype for future centres.

Although ORT has established a reputation for working with disadvantaged students, that aspect is not the main focus of their work, said Gideon Meyer, director of education for the London-based World ORT Union.

"We still do that, but our main thrust is comprehensive education with a very strong emphasis on science and technology," said the native Tel Avivian, in town to launch a fundraising campaign for the new project.

In England, ORT is recognized as a consultant to the British Ministry of Education on the introduction of modern technology into schools, Meyer pointed out.



Gideon Meyer

ORT's 60-person London office manages an international network of schools and educational programs in 52 countries with a total of 12,500 employees and 252,000 students.

In implementing its new project, ORT Canada is joining a trend among American ORT "friends" groups such as those in Atlanta, Chicago, Los Angeles and Miami which have "become operational" over the past decade.

"I think ORT can help to change the way we teach and the way people learn. The North York board of education is recognized all over Canada as being a very forward thinking and innovative board prepared to look at new techniques to impart skills training," said Diane Uslaner, ORT Canada's national executive director.

Quebec groups join forces

Bernard said the FEDERATION CJA/CJC-Q consultations across Canada will take place as part of the work of CJC's national unity committee, and involve the tripartite coalition that includes the Greek and Italian communities.

Like the Jewish community, they will stage their own meetings across Canada with their respective communities "to deal with the Canadian unity problem in a tolerant and understanding fashion," Bernard said.

"If we don't get the rest of Canada interested in solving the problem, the problem will never be solved, because there will never be enough public support for any concession to Quebec.

"If the premiers don't have the sense that the people they represent have a willingness and interest to deal with the issues, the issues will never be dealt with," he said.

Briefly, Bernard said other aspects to the community plan of action will include:

- "Continuing and intensifying" CJC-Q/coalition rapprochement trips to Quebec regions.
- Responding in a timely manner to each and every episode of ethnocentric sentiment expressed in a "very aggressive manner," which did not take place previously.
- And seeking to maintain the "level and frequency of our interactions with government."

FEDERATION CJA indicated that the plan of action will also include promoting the community's employment programs for young people and providing greater exposure to "French language and the Quebec culture" in the Jewish day school system.

Bernard suggested that although the issues of sovereignty and ethnocentrism have tested their relationship, the Jewish community has been "remarkably successful in being able to work with government on all other agenda items."

Bernard said ethnocentric sentiments have been a "huge factor" in contributing to Jewish community anxiety, to the point that more Jews might have been open to voting Yes had such "exclusionist" views not been expressed.

He was also pessimistic about the situation improving unless all sides of the debate make accommodations.

"French-Quebecers have to radically change their attitudes towards minorities within Quebec and towards the rest of Canada," Bernard said.

"The rest of Canada must radically change its attitude towards Quebec [to allow for recognition of] the specificity of Quebec.

"And the Jewish community needs to feel more comfortable about their place in Quebec society."

HAMILTON — Less than three months into his job as the new Jewish National Fund's (JNF) emissary to central Ontario's Jewish communities outside Toronto, Brig.-Gen. Dov Dekel already feels at home.

He's here with his wife, Batia, and their three younger children, daughters age 2½ and 17, and a son, 11. In Israel they have a daughter, 19, in the army; another, 22, who studies alternative medicine; and a son, 25, a medical student.

The retired Dekel finds himself a civilian for the first time he joined the Israel Defence Force 29 years ago.

He is still in shock over the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, whom he knew well and recalls as a man who "always went directly to the details without any great formalities."

A veteran of the 1967, 1973 and "Peace for the Galil" wars, Dekel served as a paratrooper from 1966 to 1982 and as brigade commander in the Lebanese security zone from 1983 to 1986.

He was military commander in Judea and Samaria from 1986 to 1987, served as second division commander on the Lebanese border from 1988 to 1990 and was division commander on the 300-kilometre-long border with Egypt until 1994.

Dekel says he was also involved in the initial secret negotiations with the PLO that led to the Oslo accords.

He chose to work for the JNF, he says, because he sees it as Diaspora Jewry's strongest connection with Israel.

He talks about Israel's continuing need for support, especially now if the peace process is to continue, and the importance of Israel's supremacy in the Middle East economically, militarily, industrially and in education and agriculture, adding that a secure Israel means security for all Jews everywhere.

Dekel has already visited the Jewish communities in London, Windsor, St. Catharines, Oakville and Kitchener, and plans to visit others.

Everywhere, he makes a point of going into classrooms, "because for me," he says, "the connection between young people and Israel is very, very important."

Labor camp survivors meet 50 years after liberation

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — On Parliament Hill three weeks ago, a guest speaker at the unveiling of a postage stamp commemorating the end of the Holocaust, Philip Riteman, a Holocaust survivor from Nova Scotia, began his brief remarks with an itinerary of his trip through hell: Auschwitz, Dachau, Lansburg.

David Shentow, a survivor living in Ottawa, caught his breath.

"The minute he mentioned Lansburg, I looked at my wife and said, 'We have something in common here,' " says Shentow. "It's the first time in 50 years I have met someone who was from Lansburg ... Nobody mentions Lansburg because no one knows about it."

As soon as the public ceremony concluded, Shentow approached Riteman. A tearful hour followed, as the two compared notes and memory fragments.

"I was shocked when he came to me," says Riteman. "I couldn't speak. I was in tears. I wondered if we knew each other."

Lansburg was one of a number of satellite camps in the mountains near Dachau where prisoners were used as slave labor in factories producing war material. The two men don't know if they ever met at Lansburg. At the time, they were only teenagers and were moved often.

"I was in a daze. I was like a zombie," Shentow says of his years in the camp. "I didn't even know who was standing beside me. I was so petrified, I was so scared, I didn't even know who was talking to me. The whole thing was like a nightmare."

But they know from comparing the numbers on their arms that they arrived at Auschwitz within a month of each other. As young teenage boys, they were spared the gas chambers to do the heavy work. Riteman remembers carrying loads of bricks and sand to build the crematoria. Shentow was sent with a group of 4,000 to clean up the rubble that remained in the Warsaw Ghetto after the uprising.

Both men had also been at Dachau. Lansburg was one of the last stops before they were liberated on April 29, 1945, Shentow's birthday.

They remember that the camp looked like a series of little roofs resting on the ground. Everything else was subterranean. They recall the steps leading to the factory, the deep mud on the floor when it rained, and the cold.

"We lived like rats, underground," Riteman says.

At one point, there was a call for volunteers to go to the railway station in town and clear the tracks of snow. The event stands out for Shentow because he remembers what it was like to see normal village life for the first time in several years. He was even able to beg some bread from a woman on her way home with groceries, while the guard warmed himself inside the train station.

Riteman wasn't assigned to shovel snow, but he remembers the call for volunteers, always a terrifying event because no one knew whether the guards were collecting people for work or for the gas chambers.

Riteman and Shentow agree that had liberation come a day or two later than it did, they would probably not have survived.

"It was like taking the pieces of a very faded photograph and then refocussing them, re-evaluating them," says Rose Shentow of the meeting between her husband and Riteman.

After the war, Riteman and Shentow both discovered they were the only ones in their families to survive and both came to North America after being located by relatives. And although it clearly pains them, they both speak to student groups about their experiences during the Holocaust.

"When people talk about the Holocaust, they always talk about the big camps, they never talk about the small ones," says Shentow.

If Riteman hadn't mentioned Lansburg in his speech, the two men would probably have exchanged nothing more than greetings. Now they plan to stay in touch.

Rabin: 'A symbol for all Jews'

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An Israeli general who worked closely with Yitzhak Rabin said the murdered prime minister was not just a prime minister to the Israelis. "He was in every sense a symbol for all Jews."

Brig.-Gen. Itzchak Fuchs, the Jewish National Fund shaliach in British Columbia, told a memorial meeting here at Schara Tzedeck Synagogue that "as a military man and paratrooper I fought in the Six Day War under Mr. Rabin's command. Later when he became defence minister, I had the honor to serve and be in close relationship with him while negotiating with the Jordanians and the Palestinians. I learned to appreciate his courage, wisdom, honesty and determination, not only in war times but also in peace. He took a risk for peace and he paid for it with his life."

Fuchs said Rabin will be remembered as a soldier, a prime minister and a peacemaker. "How tragic it is that his peace efforts were interrupted by shots from a gun. But the gun did not stop the legacy he left us: to make peace and not war."

The memorial, arranged by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC-P) and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, attracted 2,000 mourners — the biggest crowd ever for a Jewish public meeting here.

Among those who paid tribute to Rabin were B.C. premier Mike Harcourt; Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen; Vancouver MP Edward McWhinney; Dr. Michael Elterman, CJC-P chair; and Rabbi Mordechai Feuerstein.

Among the dozens of condolence messages which poured into the Congress office were those from the Canadian Croatian Congress, the B.C. Bosnian Association and the Hellenic Canadian Congress of B.C. All expressed hope that the peace process will continue.

"May God bless his soul and guide us all on to the path lighted up by Yitzhak Rabin," said the Hellenic message.

Sudbury, Soo remember PM

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The day after Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated, a single rose was left on the doorstep of Dr. Jacques Abourbin, a member of Sudbury's Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue and of Sudbury Interfaith Dialogue.

With the rose was a one-word message: "Shalom."

"I was deeply touched by the way all faiths in the community responded," Abourbin told The CJN.

Many non-Jewish citizens joined in services for Rabin in other Ontario cities.

At the memorial in the Sudbury synagogue, 170 representatives of the Jewish, Roman Catholic, Baha'i, United Church, Hindu, Islamic, Sikh and Serbian communities took part.

As people filed into the service, they passed a table where they could buy a tree to be planted in Israel in the prime minister's memory.

"Waging war is easy," said Muslim representative Dr. Sahid Mecci. "Making peace needs courage and vision."

Father Simon Davis referred to Rabin as "God's servant of peace," and expressed his hope that the peace process would not "slip beyond our grasp."

Rev. John Mathew of St. Mark's United Church, head of Interfaith Dialogue, helped organize the service. "We all have the same longing, we are all saying the same thing, 'Lord, we need help,' " he said.

Rabin's eulogy was delivered by Sudbury businessman Mitch Speigel.

A memorial service at Congregation Beth Jacob in Sault Ste. Marie, was attended by 125 people, including two members of the provincial legislature, Tony Martin and Bud Wildman. Many clergy and non-Jewish neighbors also attended. The service was led by Jeff Arbus.

Reporter paints gloomy picture of post-referendum era

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the last few hours leading up to the Quebec referendum, Jason Moscovitz, CBC Television News chief political correspondent, anguished over what he would say to viewers if the Yes side were to win.

"In the end, I couldn't think of anything to say," he admitted. "I decided to go with my instinct if the question had arisen."

The veteran Montreal-born CBC correspondent added that he was not the only one without a contingency plan if the Yes side won.

The longtime CBC correspondent and recipient of the Hy Solomon Award from the Public Policy Forum for excellence in public policy journalism brought a rather gloomy view of post-referendum Canada's future to the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba's (JFM) 21st Annual Luncheon held recently at the Westin Hotel here.

Up until Lucien Bouchard took charge of the Yes campaign in early October and turned it around, Moscovitz recalled, the conventional wisdom in the rest of the country was that the No vote would rest comfortably between 54 per cent and 60 per cent.

Recurring message

When Bouchard assumed command of the Yes forces, Moscovitz was covering Prime Minister Jean Chrétien on a tour of Western Canada. The prime minister's recurring message was that there was nothing to worry about — even as the polls started favoring of the Yes side.

"I filed my report stating that no one in Western Canada was excited or nervous about the coming referendum," he recalled. "Fortunately, I included a quote from Gordon Gibson, the former Liberal leader in British Columbia, who cautioned that we had better be right not to worry, because no one in the country was prepared for a Yes vote."

While he said that Parizeau's infamous post-referendum remarks were appalling, Moscovitz put them in the context of a French-speaking people trying to survive the past 350 years in an English-speaking North America.

"Quebecers are quite insulated and really have a 'them' and 'us' outlook," he said. "In my own experience, however, I have always found the Québécois to be a tolerant people. Parizeau's first wife was Polish. There is no excuse for what he said, but I can understand the hurt of losing a close campaign."

Moscovitz warned against viewing the Parti Québécois as the principal driving force behind separatism in Quebec. He reminded his audience that Quebec's provincial Liberal Party introduced the first language laws and is also demanding profound changes to Canada as it is.

He predicted that Bouchard will not have an easy time of it as premier of Quebec. Because he will not have won his position in a leadership race, he will have no natural ties of loyalty to him among any members of his cabinet.

"Neither federalists nor separatists can buy the next round," Moscovitz said. "Both sides are broke. They can only try to blame each other for the cuts that have to be made."

The JFM, by contrast, has proven to be the answer for many local Winnipeg Jewish and non-Jewish organizations and institutions faced with the need for funding special projects. The foundation's capital fund will reach $20 million this year thanks to the new Mark and Dorothy Danzker Fund, the JFM's largest single gift.

Among the more notable recipients of foundation grants this past year have been the Sharon Home, for a study of the feasibility of building a Jewish seniors care home in the south end; the Beth Israel Synagogue, to pay for repairs to its Torah scrolls; the Winnipeg International Children's Festival and the Health Sciences Centre.

Life is like a dance, you just have to know the steps

Greeting cards capture the rich imagery of Yiddish folk sayings

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Capturing the rich imagery of Jewish folk sayings in pen and ink drawings was a challenge for a Toronto human resources consultant who "doodles" on paper as a hobby.

"You would be suprised at how bawdy some of those sayings are and how many are at variance with today's society," said Marvin Schiff.

But Schiff persevered and the result is a package of eight lighthearted all-season greeting cards (there are five illustrating folk sayings and three Mazel Tov cards) being sold for $12 in aid of Yiddish education in Toronto.

Schiff's figures leap off the page, particularly the two apron-clad women wearing babushkas, who raise their skirts slightly and have a mischievous glint in their eyes, to illustrate "Life is like a dance, you just have to know the steps."

The translations are credited to Words like Arrows, by Toronto author Shirley Kumove.

"We think the boxed cards will make wonderful Chanukah gifts because there is lots of space for letters or notes," said Sam Black of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Yiddish committee. Other members are Frances Straus and Elie Moidel.

Schiff, a former professor of journalism at Carleton University in Ottawa and former Globe & Mail reporter, is married to Eda Zimler Schiff, president of Friends of Yiddish.

The cards are available at Israel's and Lasting Impressions. For information, call Frances, 416-635-1145 or Bella, 416-498-0106.

Amir threatens to 'turn the country upside down'

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Confessed assassin Yigal Amir last Sunday accused Israel's General Security Service (GSS) of murdering one of Yitzhak Rabin's bodyguards immediately after Rabin was shot.

"Why don't you publish that they [the GSS] killed one of Rabin's bodyguards?" Amir shouted to reporters during a remand hearing in Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court, saying that the truth about the assassination would "turn the country upside down."

The exchange fuelled rumors of a wider conspiracy in Rabin's murder, specifically, that authorities killed a Rabin bodyguard who was helping Amir.

Amir said a bodyguard who shouted, "They're dummy bullets!" during the shooting was killed.

Police and the GSS have said it was Amir who shouted "dummy bullets!" during the shooting to put police and bodyguards off guard.

"If the truth gets out," continued Amir, "I have information that can turn the whole country upside down. I can say something that will destroy everything. Until now this whole affair has been a masquerade. The whole system is rotten."

National Crimes Squad chief Dep.-Cmdr. Yoram Rudman dismissed Amir's claims as "total nonsense and drivel," as did other police sources.

A rumor that one of Rabin's bodyguards committed suicide about a week after the assassination has been proven false. The rumor apparently started among right-wing elements and spread to the United States, where it was reported on CNN.

Amir, his brother Haggai, and co-accused Dror Adani will probably be indicted this week.

Judge Dan Arbel asked Amir, who has chosen to represent himself, if he had anything to say.

"I did not think they would start killing people," Amir muttered, and continued talking about the peace agreement.

As he has done before, Arbel cut him off. "You are not the foreign minister," the judge said.

"They are killing people, don't you understand?" a nervous-looking Amir said.

"You are killing people," Arbel replied, remanding Amir for a further four days.

Police also asked for a further eight-day remand for Amir's brother, Haggai, who is suspected of conspiracy to murder, illegal possession of ammunition and explosives, and failing to prevent murder.

Haggai Amir was silent during the proceedings.

After an indictment is presented, police and the District Attorney's Office must show all confidential evidence to the defence.

Rabin's shloshim marked

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A 200-strong delegation of Jewish leaders from the Diaspora arrived here Monday to mark the 30th day since the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

They were invited by Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Jewish Agency Chair Avraham Burg to participate in the state's shloshim memorial ceremony on Tuesday.

Attending from Canada were Harvey Wolfe, incoming president of United Israel Appeal (UIA), Canada; UIA Canada executive director Steve Ain; Julia Koschitzky, chair of Keren Hayesod's board of trustees; and Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region.

"We need peace and unity in the House of Israel and among the Jewish people," Peres wrote in his invitation to the leaders, who will came from North and South America, Britain, Scandinavia, Western and Eastern Europe, Turkey and South Africa.

"Now is the time for the Jews of the Diaspora to demonstrate their commitment and ability to create a renewed spirit of unity with the Jews of Israel and face the future of the Jewish people together."

Diaspora leaders were scheduled to hold a wreath-laying ceremony at the Mount Herzl graveside and participate in the opening of a photographic exhibit dedicated to Rabin's life and work.

SHLOSHIM MEMORIAL STAMP

The Israel Postal Authority released a special memorial stamp to commemorate the shloshim of Yitzhak Rabin. The Postal Authority has never before attempted to release a stamp for the shloshim of any of Israel's leaders or distinguished individuals. For more details on the stamp, see the brief on page 2.

A STATEMENT BY THE COUNCIL OF TORAH SAGES OF AGUDATH ISRAEL OF AMERICA

In the aftermath of the assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzchak Rabin, a great deal of confusion has been generated about Orthodox Jews and their beliefs. We feel it our duty to set forth certain basic points to dispel the confusion:

- The assassination was an act of murder, a grievous sin that calls for unequivocal condemnation.
- The enormity of the sin is compounded by the assassin's shocking claim that his act was based on Halacha (Jewish law). We declare, categorically, that this claim is erroneous — indeed, a total distortion of fundamental Jewish values.

For the Sake of Truth: The Orthodox Jewish Position on the Assassination of Prime Minister Rabin

- Physical violence is abhorrent to Torah-observant Jews, and is an entirely inappropriate means of religious or political expression.
- The assassination should remind all Jews — no matter what their views on the Middle East peace process or any of the other policies of the current Israeli government — that inflammatory rhetoric and hateful invective often toxify the atmosphere.
- We are dismayed that this crime is being used in certain circles to generate a false impression of Orthodox Jews, thereby creating a climate of antipathy and even outright hostility toward Orthodoxy. Stereotyping and casting aspersions on an entire community for the conduct of a misguided individual or individuals is deplorable and inexcusable.

Now, as always, the Jewish people desperately need to turn their collective heart toward Avinu Shebashamayim, the One Above. "G-d shall give strength to His nation, G-d shall bless His nation with peace."

Bombing suspects arrested

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — In what may be a breakthrough, Argentine police last week arrested 15 people, including several soldiers, in connection with the bombing of the Jewish communal headquarters in 1994, which killed 86 people.

Among those arrested last Friday were soldiers who, along with the other detainees, were said to have links to terrorist groups.

They include nine sergeants, seven of them on active duty, and several civilians.

Also detained were two former non-commissioned officers discharged for participating in a Dec. 3, 1990, military rebellion.

Judge Juan Jose Galeano, the official in charge of the investigation, ordered more than 50 searches in several areas of greater Buenos Aires, including the Campo de Mayo army base, the largest in Argentina.

Galeano said he was trying to establish the source of the explosives used in the July 18, 1994 bombing, which also left least 300 wounded.

"We caught a gang that sold weapons stolen from the army," Galeano was quoted as telling the Buenos Aires daily Clarin last Saturday.

"For the first time, we have a more or less firm lead on the explosives that may have been used in the attack."

Although many arrests have been made in connection with the attack, the suspects were later released and charges dropped. The only person still being held is Carlos Telleldin, charged with selling the van used in the bombing.

The United States and Israel have blamed Iran for the attack and Galeano last year issued a warrant for the arrest of four former Iranian officials. But he dropped the charges after the Supreme Court ruled there was insufficient evidence linking them to the blast.

A source close to the investigation said in an interview that the latest arrests "might be a major breakthrough, a step in the right direction, the key to finding who gave support to the bombers."

Police Commissioner Angel Salguero, who conducted the searches, said the group now under arrest "combines different elements: extreme rightists, drug dealers and traffickers of assault weapons. They are linked to other groups capable of terrorism."

During the searches, police found 75 hand grenades, 110 detonation caps, seven rocket-propelled grenades, 60 blocks of plastic explosives, handguns and more than two pounds of marijuana.

One of the suspects was found in possession of false identifications, including fake police and judiciary officials' badges.

Jewish leaders here and abroad have complained about what they say is the slow pace of the investigation, which has to date provided no satisfactory explanation for the attack.

An earlier attack on the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires also remains unsolved — a car bombing in March 1992, which killed 29 people and left more than 100 injured.

Austria to compensate survivors

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The Committee for Jewish Claims on Austria is encouraging all Jewish Nazi victims in and from Austria to register for claims from a new fund set up by the Austrian government.

Successful claimants will receive a one-time payment of $7,000 (US) each from the National Fund of the Republic of Austria for the Victims of National Socialism.

Austria officially established the $50 million fund June 1 in connection with the 50th anniversary of the re-establishment of the republic.

About 25,000 to 30,000 former Jews of Austria are alive from the World War II period, according to the World Jewish Congress.

WJC executive director Elan Steinberg said the fund was "too little, too late," because the applicants are elderly, some of them over 100.

Although the sum was initially intended as a hardship fund, the Committee for Jewish Claims on Austria "succeeded in persuading the Austrian government to provide a payment to every surviving Austrian Jew," according to committee president Israel Miller.

Miller said even though the committee "is pleased with the establishment of the fund, we continue to press the Austrian government to increase the basic benefit."

Victims are eligibile if they:

- were citizens of Austria and living in Austria as of March 13, 1938;
- had been permanently living in Austria for a period of 10 years as of March 13, 1938, or were born as children of such persons in Austria within that period;
- before March 13, 1938, lost their Austrian citizenship or their place of residence of at least 10 years because they left the country due to the imminent march of the German armed forces into Austria; or
- were born before May 9, 1945, as children of such persons in concentration camps or under comparable circumstances.

Applicants can contact their local Austrian consulate or Austria's embassy in Ottawa.

Applications also can be sent to: Dr. Heinz Fischer, President of the Austrian Nationalrat, Parliament, A-1017, Vienna, Austria.

Refusing get, domestic violence linked

By JUDITH S. ANTONELLI
The Jewish Advocate

BOSTON — Yechiel Abramov, a Russian who immigrated to Israel and then the United States, was recently convicted by an Illinois court of conspiring to kill his wife, Angela Litvak.

Richard Rosenthal, briefly a member of a Framingham, Mass., synagogue, is accused of killing his wife, Laura Jane Rosenthal, bashing in her face and cutting out her heart and lungs.

N.Y. lawyer Joel Steinberg, in a nationally known case in 1989, abused his wife, Hedda Nussbaum, and beat to death their 6-year-old daughter, Lisa Steinberg.

Yet when Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by an Israeli Jew on Nov. 4, many Jews and newscasters bemoaned the killing of one Jew by another.

That's a perfect example of the level of denial that still surrounds domestic violence — and its too frequent outcome, domestic homicide — in the Jewish community, said female participants on a panel at the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, held here late last month.

Evelyn Brook, president of Montreal's Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get and vice-president of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights, spoke about "post-marital abuse."

A man's refusal to grant a get (Jewish divorce), as it has been understood over the centuries by rabbis, can give abusive men yet another form of control, she said.

"It is the man who initiates and executes the [divorce] ceremony," Brook said. "Jewish divorce is no-fault, in that there are no arguments or settlements. But the power in the ceremony lies with the husband, and he can forever control the wife.

"What's the difference between that and a man stalking his wife? Nothing."

A battered woman can flee to safety in a shelter, but the agunah (a woman denied a get) is "shackled to a doorjamb. Everywhere she goes she is an agunah," she said.

It is extremely important to obtain the get before a civil divorce, said Brook, adding that a man who refuses to give a get should be ostracized by his community.

He should not be invited to dinner and his business should be boycotted, she said. He should not be called up to recite the blessing over the Torah, honored at awards dinners, or allowed to serve on the boards of federations, synagogues and Jewish communal organizations, she also said.

Jill Goldberg Reitman of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto described the process used in her community of putting a clause in federation bylaws that prohibits a man from serving on the board if he has refused to give his wife a get.

"We need to tell our rabbis that we are prepared to cooperate with them to put the spotlight on the man and not take it off," Brook said. "People will say, 'He's such a good guy. It's not our business.' It is our business. He is not only abusing his wife, he is also misusing Jewish law for evil, evil ends."

"The first thing we need to do is get real about who lifts hands against whom in the Jewish community," said Nancy Schwartz Sternoff of the Baltimore-based Counselling, Helpline & Aid Network for Abused Women, also known as CHANA.

Incidents of domestic abuse greatly increase around Jewish holidays, just as they do for Christians around Thanksgiving and Christmas, she said.

"The food is not good enough, the house is not clean enough, the children are not dressed well enough," Sternoff said, listing common excuses of batterers at Passover and other supposedly "happy" times.

Rabbi Julie Ringold Spitzer, author of the book Spousal Abuse in Rabbinic and Contemporary Judaism emphasized that one in five Jews "have some connection to this issue."

She herself thought she had no family history of domestic abuse; yet when her mother read her thesis, tears came to her eyes, and she told Julie that her sister — Julie's aunt — was a survivor of domestic violence.

"Now I know why my 15-year-old cousin came to live with my grandparents," recalled Spitzer, who has spoken on this subject for 13 years.

"Ten years ago I shared statistics and defended them. Today I don't have to defend them because people are more willing to believe them."

Yet statistics are not the point, Spitzer said, quoting the Talmudic adage that to save one life is to save the world.

"There are countless women who can't go to synagogue anymore because their batterer sits on the board. There are women who can't sit at a family seder and listen to their sexual abuser make a blessing over the matzah and maror. For these women, the family, the synagogue and the holidays are unavailable."

When a battered woman leaves her husband, his attempts to control her do not stop, and may even escalate, she said.

THE LEARNING FAMILY

Ulpan Akiva's Innovative program which encourages the shared family experience.

Families from all over the world, as well as from Israel, congregate at Ulpan Akiva's Green Beach Hotel campus, beside the beach in southern Netanya, for a unique family experience combining learning with leisure, enjoying all full-board accommodation. Parents and their teenage (over 12 years) children take a part in Hebrew or Arabic courses while in the summer, the younger kids join a day camp nearby (at Mohsav Udim).

The families are joining a learning community of Israelis, tourists, temporary residents and new immigrants — Jews and non-Jews — students of all ages, civil servants, teachers on sabbatical and others.

The courses last 24 days or 8 weeks, with 5 hours of classes a day. Then there are loads of social and cultural activities during the remaining hours of the day and evening, plus walks, tours and a study Shabbat.

Netanyahu facing an uphill battle

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

These are not the best of times for Benjamin Netanyahu, the embattled leader of the Likud.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Netanyahu faced sharp internal criticism of his leadership skills prior to Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. After the murder, Netanyahu's problems multiplied. Rabin's outspoken widow, Leah, singled him out for having contributed to the climate of verbal violence before the shooting.

Still others charged that Netanyahu had been too closely linked with the forces of extremism, which spawned the likes of Yigal Amir, the confessed murderer.

In the wake of Rabin's funeral, Netanyahu launched a counter-attack, claiming that he had been unfairly impugned and rejecting the charge of collective guilt which had been levelled against the nationalist religious camp by the left.

In a bid to restore confidence in himself, Netanyahu called for a higher level of political discourse and action against "the minority which supports violence and murder."

But his soothing words have had remarkably little effect so far on his popularity. Shimon Peres, Rabin's successor, is riding a wave of sympathy and has pulled considerably ahead of Netanyahu in public opinion polls. Before the assassination, Netanyahu and Rabin were running neck-and-neck.

More importantly, surveys indicate, support for the peace process has risen, as more Israelis reach the sober conclusion that the Oslo accords are too deeply entrenched to be undone.

Netanyahu, having taken the pulse of the electorate, realizes that he cannot win the election in November 1996 unless he convinces Israelis that he is in tune with the mood of the country.

As a result, he is trying to moderate his image from that of a diehard opponent of Oslo to that of a cautious politician who can manage negotiations with the Arabs better than the Labor party.

Netanyahu adopted this seemingly pragmatic approach prior to Rabin's assassination, and observers expect him to highlight it in next year's election campaign.

No longer is Netanyahu threatening to suspend, much less scuttle, the Oslo accords. Instead, he is implying that he may not honor the Labor party's obligations to the Palestinians should the PLO breach the terms of its agreements with Israel. Moreover, Netanyahu has stopped saying that he will not negotiate with PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat, whom he nevertheless regards as a terrorist.

Despite the change of tone, Netanyahu's vision of peace with the Palestinians remains strongly rooted in Likud ideology.

He offers them extremely limited autonomy, without territorial contiguity. He believes that the Israeli army should retain ultimate responsibility for security throughout the West Bank, and he favors the construction of new settlements and the expansion of existing ones in Judea and Samaria.

Rabin was contemptuous of Netanyahu's proposals, describing them as "a joke." Certainly, the PLO — Israel's negotiating partner — would perceive them as totally unacceptable and as an unmistakable sign that the Likud was trying to freeze the peace process in its tracks.

Benjamin Netanyahu

As the election draws closer, Netanyahu is also expected to reiterate his claim that the government's slim majority in the Knesset is based on "the representatives of the PLO."

By that, he is referring to the Labor party's so-called "blocking" majority, composed of Israeli Arab members of the Knesset who unequivocably back the peace process.

Israeli Arabs, as well as Jewish liberals, widely believe that Netanyahu is sowing the seeds of racism by openly questioning the loyalty and integrity of Israel's Arab citizens. Netanyahu, for his part, denies that his statements are divisive.

Netanyahu, however, has more pressing problems on his plate. The Likud is riven by divisions and personal rivalries. Ariel Sharon, for example, has declared his candidacy for the prime ministership (Israelis, in 1996, will be able to choose the prime minister in direct elections).

And much to Netanyahu's chagrin, Rafael Eitan, the head of the right-wing Tsomet party, and David Levy, who left the Likud in a huff to form his own party, have also expressed an interest in the job. With Sharon, Eitan and Levy in the race, Netanyahu's chances of defeating Peres may evaporate.

Peres, meanwhile, is cutting into Netanyahu's natural constituency by trying to convince Israelis that he is as security minded as the late Rabin.

At the moment, Netanyahu faces an uphill battle to beat Peres. But his fortunes may brighten if a major act of Arab terrorism occurs on the eve of the election. This would harden opinion and give Netanyahu a reasonable opportunity of winning.

The Week in Israel

Nov. 27

• The leadership of the National Religious Party was sharply divided in the wake of the announcement by its chair Zevulun Hammer that the party should come to terms with and support the Oslo agreements.

• The Bank of Israel announced that it will not raise the interest rate in the month of December.

Nov. 28

• Ha'aretz reported Egypt has indicated to the countries involved that it wants them to start planning a phased withdrawal of the multilateral force stationed in the Sinai.

• At the economic development meeting in Barcelona, Tunisia's foreign minister, Habib ben-Yehiye, promised Ehud Barak that his country would soon send its diplomatic representative to Israel.

Nov. 29

• Ma'ariv reported that the Central Elections Committee may require David Levi to submit anew the 100,000 signatures which accompanied his official declaration for the forming of a new political party. After an investigation, the committee found that certain required procedures had not been followed by the Levy camp.

Nov. 30

• Two border policemen were kidnapped by Black Panther vigilantes of Fatah in Jenin. The kidnappers took the hostages to a nearby refugee camp after IDF security forces captured one of their leaders, Samir Zakarneh. The hostages were released after Israeli and Palestinian authorities interceded.

• Rabbi Eliezer Melamed, secretary of the Rabbinic Council of Yesha, was brought in to the national police office in Petach Tikvah for questioning arising from a statement he allegedly made accusing the government of being "partners in murder." He was released the same day without conditions.

Dec. 1

• Two soldiers were injured, one seriously, by Hezbollah rocketfire in south Lebanon.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• Six hundred people were expected to attend the 43rd International Congress of UIPGH "Clefs D'or" in Jerusalem.

Arms purchase 'a lie'

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Russian defence minister Pavel Grachev last Sunday angrily denied a report that Moscow had agreed to buy weapons from Israel.

"This is a complete lie," Grachev said during a tour of military bases in Israel's north.

Grachev, speaking two days after he signed a memorandum of understanding on defence cooperation with Israel, was referring to a broadcast on Israel Radio's Russian service that Moscow planned to buy missiles and tanks from Israel.

"I must say that this broadcast was not friendly and did damage," Grachev said.

He maintained that Russia and Israel did not sign any secret agreements or additional documents, other than last Friday's two-year defence accord. He said both countries will explore cooperation, but have not committed to anything specific.

"There are interests, but there is no formal agreement," said Grachev. "We want to cooperate with all the countries in the region and not only with traditional partners. We would like to start cooperation for the specific purpose of consolidating real peace in the region."

A Russian defence source said that despite appeals by Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Moscow is determined to proceed with the sale of nuclear reactors to Iran.

The source, who is accompanying Grachev, said Russia will ensure that Teheran uses nuclear technology for civilian purposes, similar to the United States' effort to curb North Korea's nuclear program.

Babes in arms?

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — He can't yet walk, but he's already been called up by Israel's army for reserve duty — as a driver.

For eight-month-old Elihu Ben-Shoshan, crawling is more his speed these days, preferably with a pacifier planted firmly in his mouth.

Nevertheless, an Israel Defence Force order recently arrived in the mail at his Carmiel home, ordering the baby to show up for duty as a driver in a month.

"I burst out laughing, I couldn't believe it," his mother Michal Ben-Shoshan told the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot. "What, they've started drafting babies into the army?"

The IDF explained that thousands of similar orders are issued every week and that mistakes sometimes occur.

Poverty growing

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — One in eight Israelis lived below the poverty line in 1994, the National Insurance Institute announced last week.

According to the institute, 671,500 people lived under the poverty line — defined as those with a monthly income of less than $780 (US). Roughly 42 per cent of them were children.

The statistics showed that 23,000 more people lived in poverty than in the previous year.

Labor and Social Welfare Minister Ora Namir said government policy had failed to reduce the number of poor.

She added that a program she initiated last year to fight poverty had only a "marginal" impact.

Books — the perfect present

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

They come in every shape and size and cater to all ages and tastes — books — Chanukah's perfect gift.

Random House is offering a cornucopia this season, ranging from cookbooks and how-tos to history, humor and children's books.

Those on your gift list with an interest in dance will enjoy Modern Ballroom Dancing by Victor Silvester, a book that provides a complete guide to the theory and practice of ballroom dancing. Each dance is described, detailed and illustrated with clear diagrams of the steps. Perfect for would-be ballroom dancers.

Aspiring ballerinas will want to read Step-By-Step Ballet Class by the Royal Academy of Dancing. From the basic positions of the feet, to exercises for the most advanced grades, the guide to ballet is a great reference for anyone with an interest in learning the art.

History buffs should receive A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People From the Time of the Patriarchs to the Present, edited by Eli Barnavi. With hundreds of maps, photographs and drawings, accompanied by chronologies and commentaries, it is a book for everyone interested in the history of our people.

The Battle for History, Re-Fighting World War Two by John Keegan, is the first book in The Barbara Frum Historical Lecture Series. In it, the author explores the differing historical views of the war, pivotal campaigns and special subjects such as intelligence and war economics.

A World War II story with a different twist, is When The Stars Went to War by Roy Hoopes. In it, hundreds of movie stars tell not only of the pictures they made out of the war bond tours, but also of their personal experiences, life in Hollywood, their romances and the combat some of them saw.

Chanukah is not the time of year to get out into the garden and start digging, but the gardeners among us can dream of warmer days while browsing through such books as The Canadian Gardener's Guide to Foliage and Garden Design by Marjorie Harris. Filled with photographs of some of the most beautiful gardens across Canada, the book delivers a wealth of information on the key to gardening artistry — good design. The Canadian Gardener's Year, also by Harris, is a diary for the gardener with advice on how to plan and maintain a healthy, attractive garden.

Pop-up miniature books published by General Publishing Ltd. are a great way to acknowledge those special people in your lives. Each book features three-dimensional paper sculptures with full color illustrations. The collection includes Crazy for You — Two Dozen Ways to Say I Love You, full of romantic suggestions, and Thank You, a book for someone who deserves extra recognition.

Cookbook's eclectic recipes delight vegans, carnivores

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

A cookbook is an ideal gift. It never goes stale, it has an indefinite shelf life and it brings enormous pleasure.

The latest cookbooks to roll off the presses satisfy virtually every taste and palate:

•The Arabian Delights Cookbook (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $20.95)is tailor-made for readers who place a high value on Middle Eastern dishes.

Anne Marie Weiss-Armush, the author, ranges far and wide. From salads and soups to meat and poultry, her eclectic recipes hit the right note.

•Food of the Sun: A Fresh Look At Mediterranean Cooking (Raincoast Books, $29.95) is a handsomely-illustrated primer on the foods of the Middle East, North Africa and Greece.

Alastair Little and Richard Whittington provide the text and the recipes, while David Gill and Alison Baratt serve up the photographs and drawings.

•The Vegetarian Table: France (Raincoast Books, $26.95) celebrates the cuisine of the countryside.

Georgeanne Brennan's recipes run the gamut from appetizers to entrees and are based on seasonal ingredients. With her book, you, too, can add a French touch to your repertoire.

•Vegetables (Raincoast Books, $12.95) is a vegetarian's delight, though carnivores will also enjoy it. Lisa Lintner's offerings, from chilled Thai avocado soup to snow pea salad with hazelnut dressing, sound positively mouth watering.

Tasty Indian, Thai, Malaysian curries

•Diane Clement at the Tomato (Raincoast Books, $14.95) is admittedly an odd title for a book. But wait. It's well worth a good perusal.

Clement, a partner in Vancouver's Tomato Fresh Food Cafe, is a fount of knowledge when it comes to low-fat haute cuisine. Examine her inventive recipes — all 110 — and you'll understand why her restaurant is so popular.

•The Complete Seafood Cookbook (Raincoast Books, $39.95) is precisely that. Bettina Jenkins' tome, replete with bright photographs, is the last word on the topic.

•In & Out of the Kitchen (Raincoast Books, $25) is expressly written for a person who doesn't want to spend more than 15 minutes making a presentable meal.

If you think that's an impossible task, read Anne Willan's recipes for starters and snacks, speedy salads, light lunches, main courses and desserts.

•The Curry Cookbook (Raincoast Books, $19.95) introduces a novice to the manifold delights of Indian, Thai and Malaysian curry.

Your teachers are Charmaine and Reuben Solomon, who have spent a lifetime immersing themselves in the subject.

•A Taste of Indochina (Raincoast Books, $29.95) distills the aromatic flavors of Thailand, Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.

Beautifully illustrated, and written by Jan Castorina and Dimitra Stais, this attractive book is sure to please.

A Chanukah dress

The Playclothes Shop-at-Home Catalogue has designed a special royal blue Chanukah dress trimmed at the hem with dancing dreidels, golden Happy Chanukah coins and Stars of David.

The lyrics to Dreidel, Dreidel run along the front of this cozy fleece long-sleeved dress, which is detailed with a white ribbed mock turtleneck, white ribbed cuffs and a decorative button front. A matching royal blue head band and white dreidel-print tights are also included.

The Chanukah outfit comes in three size ranges: toddler (2T to 4T) for $40, little girls (4-6X) for $44, and for bigger girls (7,8,10) for $52.

Orders can be placed by phone, fax or mail. The machine-washable dress will be shipped within 24 hours of order.

To order within Toronto call (416)425-1702, or fax (416) 425-3433. Those outside Toronto can call toll-free 1-800-827-5755. The catalogue is distributed by Regal Greetings & Gifts Inc.

Chanukah dress available from the Playclothes Shop-at-Home Catalogue.

Gadzooks! Zots are cool

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Looking for something a little out of the ordinary for the young people or the young at heart in your lives? Zibbers Inc., distributor of a vast array of gift items, is sure to have what you want.

Little ones will keep busy for hours with Toobers & Zots, a large-scale construction toy made out of colorful foam. The Toobers, named for the two-inch to four feet long foam tubes, bend easily into any shape imaginable. The Zots are an assortment of shapes such as stars, circles, squares, triangles, donuts, crowns that go with the Toobers like beads. Try and put them away!

The Levitron is an anti-gravity top that is sure to awe both kids and adults. Without using any string, wires or electricity, the top, when spun properly, actually floats in mid-air. Budding scientists will discover that the Levitron is able to levitate in mid-air by harnessing the lifting power produced by two opposed permanent magnets and is stabilized in space by using the gyroscope effect, which spinning produces. The American Association of Physics Teachers has called it a great toy. Not many toys can boast that rating.

Another educational gift is the Pet Plant, a plant that grows in a 'magic gel.' Great for all ages, the plant comes complete with package of seeds, seed planter, growth chamber, magic gel, birth certificate and free club membership. The non-toxic gel contains everything the plant needs to live and grow and the plants come in 32 varieties and five fluorescent colors.

Families will get into the mood for fishing with Fishin' Time, a family game for ages six and up. Players manoeuvre their fishing boat onto a fishing spot and try to catch a fish (draw a card). The card indicates the weight of the fish, so the player who catches the most pounds of fish in a designated time wins the game. Great game for a rainy cottage day.

In Master Magician, by Sandy Ransford, kids ages 8 to 14 learn the secrets of staging a magic show that will leave their friends begging for more. Included in the kit are a top hat, silk scarf, magic wand, pack of cards and a false thumb as well as all the props needed for magic coins, balls that disappear and tricks with ropes and rings.

Dolls Kids Can Make, by Sheila McGraw, is a book that shows kids how to make dolls for themselves, personalize them for friends and develop an appreciation of the craft of dollmaking. Included are ornaments to create soft crib toys or Little Red Riding Hood and Big Bad Wolf dolls.

Help!...We've Got Kids makes an excellent gift for anyone who has children.

This 190-page book contains over 1,260 listings of stores and services geared towards children. Four hundred listings are all new and the rest have been updated since the last edition published last year.

Among the categories are hotlines, amusement centres, birthday party places, bookstores, photographers, festivals, parks, sports and recreation centres and a host of others.

The two authors, Elisa Morton Palter and Shari Wert, both parents of young children, found when they moved to Toronto a few years ago, there was no place to gain access to information about places providing services for children.

"There's always the Yellow Pages," Palter said in an interview, "but a lot of places don't advertise in them." That's why she and Wert decided to publish this directory. Their first edition published last year sold 14,000 copies in just three weeks.

Palter frequently drives up and down the city's streets looking for any new places that may have opened, to include in her next edition. She also asks readers to call her up (444-7678) if they know of any places not mentioned in this directory.

The listings in the book are not paid for, so stores are not left out if they are unable to pay. All the stores and services in this directory are in the Greater Toronto Area.

There are valuable coupons in the back and a handy index to make it easier for you to find what you're looking for. All in all a wonderful gift for any parent.

Help!...We've Got Kids ($9.95) is distributed by Firefly Books to all bookstores and can also be found in some maternity stores.

Holiday Gifts

These children's books should keep parents happy

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Nearly everyone agrees that, theoretically, books are the perfect Chanukah gift for children — they are educational, inspirational, and, theoretically again, entertaining.

The problem is that very often, you have to choose between books that adults approve of and those that kids do.

Four books that should make everyone happy are How Tzipi the Bird Got Her Wings,(1995) and Abraham's Great Discovery (1991), both by Bernard Zlotowitz and Dina Maiben, published by NightinGale Resources; and two new Canadian works, Just Stay Put; a Chelm story retold and illustrated by Gary Clement (Douglas & McIntyre, 1995) and The White Stone in the Castle Wall, by Sheldon Oberman (Tundra, 1995).

How Tzipi the Bird Got Her Wings is a lush, beautifully illustrated and touching account of a lonely little bird who, because she had no wings, could not fly down to play with the other animals.

All the animals are having such a good time in the garden of Eden that they think they are too important, or too busy to keep it clean.

Only Tzipi is willing to help G-d, and for her goodness, is rewarded.

The colors are rich oranges, reds, purples, greens and blues, and the whole book is a genuine delight.

By the same authors, Abraham's Great Discovery tells the story of the patriarch Abraham as a little boy, trying to figure out where G-d is, if He is not in the statues and idols that his father has made.

The black and white sketches convey the feeling of an ancient city, and the idols have suitably snobby expressions.

Eventally it is in nature and the goodness of human beings that he finds G-d — "God is the love we know and the warmth we feel/ God is the kindness and the sweetness we enjoy."

Just Stay Put is a retelling of a well-known tale of the silly citizens of Chelm. Mendel, a poor Chelmite, dreams of visiting Warsaw, the glamorous (to him) big city. When he can no longer stand his mundane existence, he takes off for Warsaw — only to discover that it is exactly the same as Chelm.

(No, I am not going to spoil your fun in finding out how that comes to be the case.)

Kids will enjoy the well-told ridiculousness of the story, and the well-done pictures. Adults will appreciate the echoes of Chagall in the artwork.

Bet you didn't know that in the huge wall surrounding Toronto's Casa Loma there is one white stone. Well-known author Sheldon Oberman has invented a moving story about how it got there, managing to paint a picture of the vast economic and social differences there were in Toronto's prewar society, without descending into mawkishness.

The illustrations, by Les Tait, are based on buildings that are still standing in the city, including Cabbagetown streetscapes and the Yorkville fire station.

The legendary Henry Pellatt emerges as a sympathetic and understanding charactor — traits that one doesn't necessarily associate with his public personna.

At Home In Canada opens interesting doors

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Nicole Eaton and Hilary Weston open some rather interesting doors in At Home In Canada (Penguin Books. $55), their rather handsome coffee-table book.

With the able assistance of photographer Joy von Tiedemann, the two ladies celebrate the diverse, sometimes surprising, ways in which Canadians of means live.

Altogether, we're ushered into 23 homes, from Mordecai Richler's stately cottage overlooking Lake Memphremagog in Quebec's Eastern Townships to Rosalie and Isadore Sharp's exquisite sukkah in a Toronto ravine.

One of Canada's most accomplished men of letters, Richler works and entertains in the cosy home he shares with spouse Florence.

He is seen in his study, mulling over his electric typewriter, and in his rec room, contemplating a snooker table. A photo of Richler's wife, cutting herbs on the porch outside her kitchen, graces the last page of the Richler segment.

The chapter devoted to the Sharps, who are in the hotel business, turns on their sukkah, which is described as "an elegant conservatory floating among ... trees."

The Sharps — ranging from Isadore to his grandchildren — are portrayed as a close-knit family true to Jewish traditions.

At Home In Canada, the kind of book you can peruse endlessly, lends itself well as a gift to someone who appreciates architecture and interior decorating.

Broadcaster pays dues en route to Panthers perch

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back when he was growing up in the 1960s in Toronto, Jeff Rimer was like most kids his age — a hockey nut.

He watched the game on TV, followed every player move, lived and died with the Maple Leafs. He fondly remembers how Leafs great Frank Mahovlich used to sneak him into Maple Leaf Gardens to watch the morning skate and would buy him a Coke and give him a souvenir stick as well.

His late father, an immigrant to Canada who grew exasperated by the devotion Jeff gave the sport, "was always on me about watching too much hockey," Rimer recalled. "He always said, 'Is Frank Mahovlich going to give you a job?' "

Well, not exactly, but close.

Unlike most kids who have to put their love of sport on the backburner while they go out and get a real job, Rimer has parlayed his love of the game into a hockey-related career.

Jeff Rimer

At 44, Rimer is the voice of the Florida Panthers, the team's play-by-play man on the Sunshine (television) Network.

Rimer feels he's got the best of two worlds, earning a living by broadcasting games developed in the frozen north, while living in the palmed splendor of the summery south.

"To me it's not work, it's a job I enjoy. How many people get to say they enjoy their work?" Rimer said.

Rimer's resume suggests he's paid his dues getting to his plum position.

At 15, Rimer moved to Calgary and attended Mount Royal College, where he studied broadcasting.

He worked part time in radio and TV and hosted a sports talk show on a local cable station.

"I just knew this is the business I wanted to be in," he said.

From Calgary he moved to Lethbridge, where he became a jack-of-all-trades, doing the TV news, weather and sports at night and radio sports at other times.

After a year learning the business, he was recruited to the CBC's Edmonton office.

In 1976, he got a big break when he was assigned to broadcast the CBC's gymnastics coverage at the Montreal Olympics.

The exposure helped Rimer develop new contacts and with his wife Ferrel, a Los Angeles native, the couple moved to Southern California.

For a time, Rimer tried his hand at freelance work in Los Angeles, but he grew anxious at the lack of full-time employment. He then accepted a job working with Dick Irvin at CFCF in Montreal. There he hosted Expos and Canadiens games, as well as some radio talk shows.

In 1984, the former manager of CFCF enticed Rimer to Baltimore, where he spent 10 years as sports director of WBAL Radio. During that time, he joined the Washington Capitals' broadcast team, in a round-about sort of way.

Larry King (yes, that Larry King) used to host Caps' hockey and conduct interviews. One day, "he literally handed me the mike and introduced me as the new host" of the show, without consulting the station's management, Rimer said.

Management evidently liked what they saw, and Rimer spent about 10 years as play-by-play man with the Caps.

With expansion to Florida, Rimer moved down to the Sunshine State. "I felt it was a great opportunity to work with an expansion team and a great organization," he said.

Teamed with color commentator Denis Potvin, the former Islander great, the pair provide exciting and erudite coverage.

Despite suggestions the Panthers are for sale, Rimer believes Florida is a great hockey market with lots of potential, thanks to the many transplanted northerners who reside there.

"I'd feel a lot better here if I knew the team was going to stay. I definitely feel they are going to stay. I think something will be worked out, " he said.

In their third season, the Panthers are making great strides on the ice. "The Panthers will continue to surprise more people. This team is for real. As well as they've played in the past, I think they're a playoff team," he said.

Meanwhile, unlike his late father, he's encouraging his 17-year-old son, Josh, to make broadcasting a career. Josh already works as the floor director in the intermission studio at Panthers games. If only his grandfather could see them now.

Bowler snags title

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Question: where does the best female tenpin bowler in the world live?

The answer: Montreal. Debby Ship of Cote St. Luc returned from the 13th world tenpin championships in Reno, Nevada after beating out some 250 other women from over 60 countries, including Israel.

Ship set a women's world single record with a six-game total score of 1,318.

"It still hasn't sunk in," says Ship, 35, who lives in Cote St. Luc and has been bowling seriously for about a decade. "I finished way beyond my expectations."

Ship, a gold medal veteran of the Maccabiah Games, went to Reno as a member of the six-man and six-women Canadian national team.

She carried back not only the world crown, but also the eight bowling balls (she owns 30!) she shleps with her to tournaments (and which cost her excess baggage charges).

Each ball is weighted and drilled differently to accommodate the subtle variations that can affect the movement of a bowling ball down a lane – including the type of oil used to leave that gleaming lustre on the surface.

That is what a lot of people still don't understand about bowling, says Ship. Outside the bowling world, her feat went almost unnoticed, at least in the local printed press. To many, the sport still conjures up a blue-collar image of beer guts or a B'nai Brith boys' night out.

But in fact, said Ship, who bowls right-handed, tenpin bowling takes fitness, discipline, timing, a positive attitude, technique and above all mental focus.

"Besides hand-eye coordination, you need strong arms and strong legs," she says. "It's a technical sport more than anything else."

Much music a holiday treat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Music has to be one of the most appreciated — and long-lasting — gifts there can be, not only for children at this Chanukah season, but for adults anytime.

We enjoy music not only for its own sake (and both the tapes in this review are exceptionally good to listen to), but to bring back the good times of the past. Which is not a bad thing at all.

Just in Time for Chanukah is a beautifully done tape by singers Margie Rosenthal and Ilene Safyan of Portland, Ore. They have lovely voices, which is not always a given in children's music, and they have chosen their material well.

Traditional versions of such songs as O Chanukah, Mi Yimaliel and Mo'az Tsur will have everyone singing along, and are great to introduce well-known Chanukah songs to a new generation.

They have also chosen new melodies, a touching Yodim Atem, a bouncing Eight Candles and Take a Potato that will surely have younger children singing the verse "Take a potato pat, pat, pat/Fry it in a pan with fat, fat fat" over and over.

I especially liked The Ballad of Judah Maccabee, where the story of Chanukah is set to a country and western beat.

The popular neo-Klezmer group Tzimmes has done it again. Their superb tape Sweet and Hot of a few years ago has been followed recently by a CD, A Lid for Every Pot, and it's every bit as good.

The team of Yona Bar-Sever, Moshe Denburg, Myrna Rabinowitz and Julian Siegel combine the well-known with original in a combination that makes you try to figure out how to get to the next piece as quickly as you can while still savoring the tune you are listening to.

There is a moving Oyfn Pripetshik, a sparkling Yome Yome, which tells the story of a father trying to figure out how to make his daughter happy — until he figures out that what she wants is a husband — and a new (to me) Yiddish tune Tayere Malkele.

Ladino, Yiddish, Hebrew, Klezmer — the combination is delightful.

Listen especially to Rachav Hayam, Hebrew lyrics by Moshe Denburg and Simon Ophir set to the traditional folk tune O Waly.

Just in Time for Chanukah and A Lid for Every Pot are available in Jewish book stores.

Nostalgic songs help while away the hours

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The holiday season is as fine a time as any to sit back, relax and listen to good old-fashioned Jewish songs in Hebrew.

If you're like me, you'll be carried away on a cloud of joy by these mostly familiar melodies, now available on four new cassettes.

The tapes in question, produced by Intersound International of Scarborough, Ont., are entitled Horas & More, To Life — Le Chaim! Party Favorites and Let's Dance.

The nostalgic and infectious songs are performed by a group called David & The High Spirit, which acquits itself respectfully.

Ranging far and wide, they run the gamut from Dayenu and Bashanah to Eretz Eretz and Avinu Malkeinu.

Klezmer tunes and Spanish-accented music interpreted in Israeli style are thrown in for good measure.

With these cassettes on hand, you can while away the hours beautifully.

Shohat, Peres At Odds

JERUSALEM– Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres was to meet late last week with Finance Minister Avraham Shohat to review the Defence Ministry's financial needs for next year.

Calling the meeting "critical" and hinting at a possible confrontation, Shohat said Peres, who's also Defence Minister, should realize as former finance minister that Israel's power lies primarily in a sound economy.

Shohat said he hopes Peres will know how to strike "the right balance " between economic and military needs.

IKEA Furnishes Israel

LOS ANGELES – IKEA, the popular Scandinavian-based furniture company, has decided to enter the Israel market.

Last year the Simon Wiesenthal Center investigated IKEA's corporate policies after reports that the company founder and chairman, Ingvar Kamprad, was associated with Sweden's fascist movement in the post World War II years.

IKEA was also investigated for possible complicity in the Arab economic boycott of Israel.

Bank Optimistic

TELAVIV – The economic growth which has characterized Israel since 1990 is expected to continue, experts at Bank Hapoalim say.

Rafi Ben-Ami, chief representative for the bank in Canada, said the bank expressed confidence in the ongoing momentum of economic development at a rate of 5 to 6 per cent of GDP annualy.

The peace process, the wave of Soviet immigration, economic reforms,d technological developments and former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's policies all contributed to the economy's boost.

Honor For Canadian

TORONTO – David Eisenstadt, founding partner of The Communications Group Inc. of Toronto, has been elected into the Public Relations Society of America's College of Fellows.

Eisenstadt is only the second Canadian to receive this honor. The College of Fellows has 292 members.

Textile designs finding niche

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Tandy Zeisler was unable to find the type of clothing she wanted for her children in stores she started making the clothing herself. She enjoyed this creative outlet so much she ended up leaving a business administration career.

Zeisler enrolled in an interior design course, but when she began decorating homes she couldn't find the bedding she was looking for. Two years ago she took a silkscreening course and began creating her own fabrics.

Today the mother of three heads Home & Company, her own textile design company, which she runs out of her Thornhill home.

She uses natural and non-toxic material for her product line which includes hand-painted or handscreened bedding, drapery, floor cloths, pillows, throw cushions, chair pads, furniture, picture frames and children's furnishings.

She also paints children's clothing, silk and cotton vests for adults, wall murals and she continues to do decorating.

This month was a milestone for Ziesler. She started designing for a major bedding manufacturer. "I was very excited," she said. "I approached them a year ago. They finally had work for me to do. I'm hoping they'll eventually buy my designs."

Her work appeals to people who want something different, Zeisler said. "I like to create things that you're not going to find anywhere else. People want different bedding, especially for their children. They like the fact that they can have input into the design and colors."

Home & Company's children's bedding — there are prints of jungle animals, ballerinas, cowboys, construction equipment and other children's themes — can be found at stores that sell children's furniture such as The Bunk House, Frankel's Fine Furniture and A Room of My Own.

Zeisler also sells her products to Perkins and Pape, the Arts on King and at gift shows. This year she landed a booth at the One of a Kind Show now running at Exhibition Place .

She started marketing her products at craft shows 1½ years ago and within six months she was practically selling out at all the craft shows she attended.

One of her big sellers is her hand-painted children's denim jacket, she said. "I can't stop painting jean jackets. They're in such big demand that I have people on a waiting list."

Zeisler plans to expand into the American market — she started attending trade shows in the United States — and she's also eyeing the licensing market, she said.

She also wants to increase production, she said. "I know it could be a bigger business. It's still a cottage industry [and] everything could be automated easily."

Right now she does all her work on what she describes as a "simple" silk screen light table, but she plans to change her equipment when she moves to a commercial space early in 1996; she's outgrown her home studio, she explained.

In a perfect world Zeisler would leave the marketing and production to a partner and she would just attend to the creative end of the business, she said. "I'd be thrilled never to leave here and just keep designing and painting. The most gratifying thing is seeing something in my mind and being able to make it.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Beam Me Up, Hershie: DLZ Media, a publishing house in Oregon, is about to release the first issue of an intended quarterly series of Jewish science fiction books called The Stars of David.

According to editor D. J. Kessler, the series will be going far beyond a short story anthology or anything else in this subgenre published in the past.

"Not since Jack Dann's Wandering Stars in 1974 and his follow-up sequel, More Wandering Stars, in 1981, with introductions by Isaac Asimov, has anything come along with such a fresh and bold approach," Kessler said. "We've asked our authors to let their minds soar into the future, answering the question, 'What possibilities might develop for the Jewish community?' "

One story in the first volume is Can Androids Be Jewish? by Joe Sampliner. In it, Josh Kominski, a university professor from one of Earth's colonies, becomes the manager of a mining outpost run by 4,900 androids who convert to Judaism.

Another story, Miriam's World, by Sol Weiss, focuses on Captain Ben Goldberg and the IDF's frontier fleet, as an alien force attacks the Israeli frontier some 20,000 light years from Earth and some 900 years in the future.

Planned stories include A Time Travelling Kibitzer, in which a time-travelling rabbi anonymously visits his Jewish relatives in the past, and Aliyah to the Stars, in which three American families rediscover their Jewish roots and head for Israeli colonies in space.

The book (roughly 400 pages) is $15 US if ordered before Dec. 15 (otherwise $18 US). The series is rated PG (parental guidance) and contains no graphic violence, sexual content or obscenity. Write DLZ Media, 2300 Oakmount Way, Suite 205A, Eugene Ore. 97401, or phone 1-800-497-7568.

Violinist at Holy Blossom: In a change from the usual evening format, the Holy Blossom Temple's Musical Heritage Series showcases Jacques Israelievitch, the outstanding concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, in an afternoon concert.

Israelievitch has appeared as a soloist around the world, and was knighted by the French government last year. Sunday Dec. 10, 3 p.m., 1950 Bathurst Street, Toronto. Tickets (adults, $15) available at the door, or call 416-789-3291, ext. 503.

Pope Wins Jewish Award: A representative of Pope John Paul II accepted an award in Boston last month for extraordinary contribution to the historic dialogue between Jews and Catholics.

The Pope received the 1995 National Jewish Book Award for the book Spiritual Pilgrimage: Texts on Jews and Judaism, 1979-1995, which presents his various writings, homilies and speeches on the importance of Judaism and the Jewish people.

Narayever Singers: The Narayever Community Singers, under the direction of Toronto musician Brian Katz, have been celebrating the rich diversity of Jewish music since 1991, when a group from the Narayever Synagogue (an egalitarian congregation on Brunswick Avenue in Toronto), first assembled. The choir is seeking new members. It meets Thursday evenings, 7:30 to 9:30 p.m., except the first Thursday of the month. 416-656-5995.

Katz and Allan Merovitz, lead vocalist of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, perform their hartzedike lieder (heart songs) at the Mezzetta Cafe Restaurant, 681 St. Clair Ave. W. at Christie, Wed. Dec 13, with sets at 9:15 and 10:30. This is their last Toronto performance before their second European tour.

In Brief: Hot bedcovers by 10 cool artists are the subject of A Cold Winter's Night at the York Quay Gallery, Harborfront, Toronto, Dec. 8 to Jan. 7.

Paul Brodie, saxophone, and Glen Montgomery, piano, perform From Ragtime to Bernstein, featuring the works of Milhaud, Srul Irving Glick, Berlin, Joplin, Rodgers, Arlen, Gershwin and others. Sat. Dec. 2, 8 p.m. Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, North York.

Open House at Avenue Road Arts School, 460 Avenue Rd., Sunday Dec. 10, 1 to 5 p.m. 416-961-1502.

Business Profile

Furniture firm's customers get 'wow' service

IKOR sales boom 1,275 per cent in five years

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Igor Korenzvit doesn't have a magic formula to account for the success of his upscale office furniture business. In fact, the idea of such a recipe is anathema to him.

"The business environment is changing very quickly. You have to be on top of it, and if you're very good, a step ahead," said the 49-year-old president of IKOR Integrated Facilities Inc. "The things that worked for us a year ago, or even six months ago, don't work any more."

Judging by the company's elegantly appointed 14,000-square-foot showroom on Lawrence Avenue West, Korenzvit has continued to find out what works.

IKOR's 1994 sales of $11.6 million — an increase of 1,275 per cent over the previous five years — are all the more remarkable given the decline of the furniture market in North America over the same period, its worst in recent memory.

In the Toronto area, industry sales plummeted from $300 million in 1989 to $160 million in 1994.

IKOR's clients over that period included major corporations and financial institutions. Their largest project was a $3.2-million installation completed in 1993.

That year IKOR ranked 13th on the Profit 100 list of fastest growing Canadian companies. In 1995 it ranked 53rd. What's significant, Korenzvit pointed out, is that IKOR was the only furniture company on the list.

When he started his business 11 years ago, Korenzvit worked alone out of part of a 120-square-foot room not far from his present location.

Bonnie, his wife of 20 years and IKOR's vice-president, joined him early on.

Korenzvit attributes their "unusual and successful" business relationship to their having separate responsibilities and complete trust. "We definitely would not have a business of this size if both of us were not participating," he said.

Today IKOR has 15 full-time employees and up to 20 people working on installations. The company represents about 60 manufacturers, the majority of which are American.

Because of Canada's free trade agreement with the United States, American furniture has become more affordable in Canada. Many Canadian furniture companies could not compete, Korenzvit explained. Before the agreement came into effect, duty charged on American furniture was as high as 25 per cent, he said.

Although he has no formal business training, Korenzvit feels the structured education he received in his native Kiev has served him well. A graduate of Kiev Polytechnical University, he holds master's degrees in both mechanical and electrical engineering.

He immigrated to Canada in 1973 and worked as a junior engineer for one year before landing an intermediate and then a senior engineering position in the corporate world.

After a two-year stint with a local furniture dealer, where he was able to use his expertise in facilities planning, Korenzvit decided to open his own business.

Igor Korenzvit, president of IKOR Integrated Facilities Inc., had sales of $11.6 million in 1994. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

From the beginning, he has eschewed advertising, relying solely on word of mouth. "I think if people buy because they see your big ad, there's no loyalty to the person they're buying from."

Korenzvit does his best to ensure that loyalty isn't a one-way street. Posted above his desk are The 10 Commandments of IKOR, a copy of which has been distributed to each employee. Each rule is a reminder of how to treat clients well and why this is important.

Korenzvit's policy is to make each client feel like the only customer, and he's made a point of hiring like-minded employees. He believes in giving people more than they expect, a notion he describes as "wow" service.

But the high quality and esthetic appeal of IKOR's furniture is equally important. A number of the pieces can be found in New York's Museum of Modern Art.

Eye-catching bentwood chairs, sleek tables and a striking European-designed table thermometer resembling a liquid-filled sculpture are among the items combining function and beauty.

"When I see nice furniture, for me it's like looking at a nice painting," said Korenzvit.

"I don't feel I would be able to give good service without good quality and good design furniture. [We offer] very good service for a very good price."

His prices might seem steep to the uninitiated: $350 would be the minimum for a good desk chair, Korenzvit advised.

His own chair — made by the American-owned company Knoll — is in the $600 range.

Rolling backwards in the chair to demonstrate its features, Korenzvit noted that although more expensive chairs are available, "in comfort, this is as good as they come."

His chair seat can be raised or lowered at the touch of a button, as can the back which has a lumbar support to minimize muscle strain. The back can also be tilted backwards or forwards. Unlike lower-priced chairs, this one features only a minimal upward seat tilt when the back is tilted backwards. Even the casters are specially designed so as not to mar the carpets.

Anyone who says a good chair is too expensive is "missing the boat," according to Korenzvit. If a chair is not comfortable, not only will it need to be replaced sooner, but the person using it will take more frequent breaks, he explained. The cost of new furniture would be made up in increased efficiency, he said.

Most aspects of Korenzvit's business relate to efficiency in one way or another. His company offers complete service from office design through installation to warranty service if necessary.

On a smaller scale, IKOR was among the first in Toronto to offer built-in adjustable computer mousepads and keyboards that take up no desktop space.

About 10 per cent of the company's business is custom work, but IKOR's wide variety of modular pieces mean that office spaces can be customized without specially designed pieces.

For Korenzvit, working efficiently is a matter of common sense. A proponent of recycling, he encourages suppliers to use minimal packaging. "There's no sense putting chairs in boxes, for example. Why not just put blankets around them? They save money, we save money and the environment benefits."

Despite IKOR's size, the company doesn't need a large garbage bin, Korenzvit pointed out. All cardboard is sent for recycling, and IKOR's waste "is literally just a few garbage bags."

Perhaps it's Korenzvit's appreciation for efficiency that allows him to work a 60-hour week — he once logged 98 phone calls in a single day — and still make time for community involvement.

A member of the board of directors of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, he is also a vice-president of Jewish Vocational Service and serves on the committee of Project Renewal. (Among the organizations supported by IKOR are Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the Hamilton Opera and the Hospital for Sick Children.)

"For me, sleep is like a waste of time," he said.

It surprises Korenzvit to read how many business owners, when asked about their goals, list expansion or "being the biggest in Canada."

At IKOR, said Korenzvit, being big is a tool, not an objective.

12 month Contract Position, Baycrest Foundation

We are seeking an Event Specialist to administer, plan, and coordinate the execution of the events of Baycrest's Leadership Development Group. This includes one of the largest charity golf tournaments in the country, a major bicycling event and several other dynamic projects.

You are a take charge person who thrives on pressure but lives for detail. You have the experience and background necessary to develop and execute new initiatives for increasing fundraising potential in cooperation with a high energy group of volunteer leaders.

A relevant degree is complemented by 2–5 years of successful experience in a fund-raising environment. You also possess well developed organizational and leadership skills.

Kindly submit your resume to:

Human Resources Department
Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care
3560 Bathurst Street
North York, Ontario M6A 2E1
Fax: (416) 785-2490.

We thank all applicants, however, only those candidates selected for an interview will be contacted.

Dear Susan,

I have recently decided to end my marriage after two years of marital therapy. My husband refuses to believe our marriage is over. He will not attend marital therapy because he blames the therapist for the deterioration of our marriage. I have just become involved with another man and my 15-year-old daughter overheard a conversation I had with him. What should I do?

Dear Reader,

I would recommend that you and your husband return to marital therapy and explore why each of you has acted the way you have in derailing both the therapy and the marriage. This should include a frank exploration of how the two of you, as individuals and as a couple, have dealt with past losses. As part of this exploration, you must examine the way in which the coping strategies of your families of origin have impacted on your own strategies. It appears that both you and your husband have problems coping with loss: your husband in his refusal to let go (separation anxiety), and you in your haste to start a new relationship (complicating bereavement). You need to examine and work through these problems before you can resolve the end of your [illegible] in appropriate manner.

As the rejected party, your husband deserves the right to move through a grieving process. You have complicated his grieving, as well as your daughter's, by introducing a third party before they have had the opportunity to come to terms with their new reality. You have also deprived yourself of the opportunity to mourn the loss of your marriage. Before you can properly accept the stresses and responsibilities of a new relationship, you must ensure that you have achieved an appropriate closure of your current relationship. This can only come about if you focus on what is important now: processing your feelings related to the ensuing divorce and allowing the family to reorganize itself.

Your daughter is particularly vulnerable. Your lack of discretion has put her in emotional jeopardy, in that she is now the keeper of knowledge she wasn't meant to have, and she is forced to choose whether to be your accomplice or your betrayer. You must release your daughter from this burden by revealing all to your husband. You owe it to both of them to allow the grieving and rebuilding process to take place without complicating factors.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 17 years.

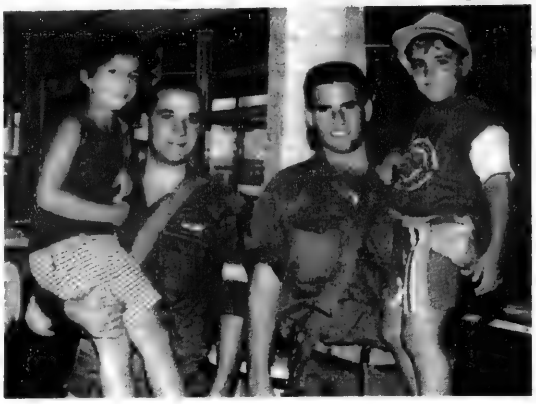
Fundraiser under way

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter



The Israeli soldiers who serve as counsellors at the Summer Camp for Widows and Orphans form strong bonds with the children.

TORONTO — Over 20,000 Chanukah candles — one to an envelope — have been sent across Canada for the ambitious annual campaign of the Association for the Soldiers of Israel.

In contrast to Canadian winter temperatures, the Israeli project supported by the campaign is heartwarming.

Every summer, the IDF provides respite for widows and children of soldiers killed in the line of duty, in the form of a summer camp.

Toronto volunteer Carol Baratz was so moved by a 1987 visit to the camp that she successfully undertook to convince board members in Toronto to earmark the proceeds of the Chanukah campaign for this project.

Since 1988, she and Fira Rotenberg have co-chaired the campaign.

The summer camp, located for the past two years in a military facility in Hadera (previously in Netanya) and staffed by soldiers on a volunteer basis, costs the equivalent of $300,000 to run for five weeks.

Last year, the Toronto-based project raised close to $100,000.

One elderly woman in Winnipeg responded a number of years ago with a $1,000 donation and a heartfelt note describing her feelings about the Israeli soldiers. Since that time she has donated a total of $20,000 and has maintained a warm two-way correspondence with Baratz.

During their five-day stay at the camp, almost 2,000 widows every summer are treated to day trips, swimming, fashion shows and performances by major Israeli entertainers such as Yehoram Gaon. Counselling is also available.

Baratz was struck by the number of very young widows and the fact that participants represent every war in Israel's 47-year history. Some of the women were widowed as far back as Israel's War of Independence in 1948. She also noted that Druze widows were among those attending.

One mother of two, youthful and stylish-looking, says on an association video that she didn't want to be identified as a widow, but that attending the camp recharged her batteries "which had almost died the day of the tragedy."

"[Going on vacation by themselves] is not the same as being with a group of women all in the same position," said Suellen Boyd, administrator for the association in Toronto.

Children, housed separately from their mothers, participate in typical camp activities like sports and arts and crafts. Youngsters have said that being with others who have lost a father helps them realize that they have experienced the same difficult emotions.

The counsellors are soldiers who have a special relationship with the children, becoming like father figures to them, said Baratz.

"The army staff is incredible," she said. "They put the children on their shoulders, they sing, they dance."

Unfortunately, the need for the camp is still growing, she added. "We have to hope peace will come."

Shai L'Chayil, an established association project, is being run to coincide with Chanukah for the first time. A combination fundraising/educational project, the goal is to link students with Israeli soldiers through letter-writing.

'Silent majority' rallies

Jewish Telegraph Agency

NEW YORK — Last Sunday morning's rally at Madison Square Garden marked for some the awakening of the "silent Jewish majority" in America that has long supported the Arab-Israeli peace process but was not moved to express that support until last month's assassination of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The overflow crowd was clearly a relief to rally organizers, who had wrangled intensively in recent days over a program that would not alienate opponents of the peace process.

Although not everyone at the gathering belonged to the Israeli government's peace camp, all seemed bent on demonstrating their support for Israel, Jewish unity and the pursuit of peace.

An estimated 14,000 people, including more than 40 members of the U.S. Congress and a host of other dignitaries, braved freezing temperatures, tight security and logistical snafus to enter the arena and pay tribute to the memory of the slain Israeli leader.

They were exhorted to honor Rabin's legacy of peace, by Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, U.S. Vice-President Al Gore and Rabin's widow Leah, all of whom underscored the close friendship between the United States and Israel.

Peres drew the loudest applause when he called for broadening the circle of peace to include Syria and Lebanon and when he called for Jewish unity.

"When you have two views, you don't have to become two people," he said.

"We do recognize the right of the opposition to oppose us," he said, but Jews should "be united against murder, against violence, against curses. Let's argue, not hate."

Peres underscored Rabin's courage in pursuing peace in the face of intense opposition. He said Rabin walked through "streets of hatred, squares of chaos, avenues of accusation."

Although Rabin was "not indifferent" to what was being said, "he did not change his mind," Peres said, and "paid the highest price" for it.

Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau, meanwhile, called on Jews everywhere to draw on their tradition of love, respect for human life, solidarity and brotherhood.

Religious Jews "know what it means to appreciate human life" and have to think about "our failure," said Rabbi Lau.

The poetry of Chanukah

Editorial

It was a deliciously impossible task to choose "winners" of The CJN's Chanukah poetry contest. But ultimately, despite the impossibility, "winners" had to be chosen. The assignment fell to a small panel of judges, who through instinct and "feel," selected the final six. They are published on the front page of the Chanukah Greetings supplement in this issue.

The CJN received hundreds of poems, many of them carefully crafted, lovingly drawn excursions into unique personal experiences and openly shared emotions. We felt privileged to be invited to join those excursions and we delighted in our readers' creativity and imagination.

In addition to publishing the official "winners," we deemed it worthy to publish some of the poems in the space reserved each week for letters to the editor. And because we ran out of space to accommodate even more poems, we have listed certain "honorable mentions" on the back page of the supplement.

Imagery and irony, allusion and rhyme, these reliable poetic devices were richly evident in the poems sent to us, each an attempt – some clumsy, some polished – to capture and convey a sense of Chanukah. But then, the story of Chanukah lends itself to poetry. It has so many interconnected and interwoven aspects.

Prose is the usual fare of our lives, the routine and the reliable, which we depend upon to provide balance and stability. But poetry is a spark we glimpse; or if we are truly fortunate, we touch, every now and then, an inspiration, a higher notion. Much like a poem we remember and cherish, Chanukah is the sum of its many compelling aspects. Few against many; courage against submission; the force of an idea against the idea of force. There is the poetry of a candle's flame compared to the prose of the sun's rays; the poetry of light compared to the prose of darkness. There is the poetry of a child learning, touching the generation which came before, compared to the prose of a child learning, touching no one. There is the poetry of commitment compared to the prose of indifference.

Chanukah, then, tells us categorically, even poetically, that life means choice. Like our forebears, we can choose to live our lives only as comfortable thoroughfares of prose; or on occasion, we can challenge ourselves to seek a different road, to aspire to the poetry of a life lived not only for ourselves but for a higher purpose. Happy Chanukah.

CANADA

CJC Appeals on Pollard

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Goldie Hershon has written to the United States' Ambassador to Canada, James Blanchard, asking him to convey to President Bill Clinton CJC's "strong hope and desire that the harsh sentence meted out to [imprisoned spy for Israel] Jonathan Pollard soon be commuted."

Hershon pointed out that both former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and current leader Shimon Peres have made pleas to Clinton for commutation of his life sentence for passing secrets to Israel.

"We believe the timing is right for President Clinton to pardon Mr. Pollard," Hershon wrote. "It is in no one's interest to keep Jonathan Pollard incarcerated any longer."

Hebrew U. Program

TORONTO — The Hebrew University of Jerusalem is instituting a one-year pre-medical specialization program for overseas students, to begin in 1996.

The program will include participation in a research project. Applicants need a 3.0 or higher grade point average and at least one (preferably two) years of university. An advanced proficiency in Hebrew is recommended.

For details, call Michael Litvack at 416-485-8000 (1-800-668-3956 in Ontario and Quebec), or fax 416-485-8565. E-mail address is 75477.201@compuserve.com.

Israel Youth Programs

MONTREAL — The Youth and Hechalutz department of the Canadian Zionist Federation is "extremely pleased" to report that participation in Israel Experience programs in Canada in 1995 was up by 22 per cent over last year.

The two groups which sent the largest number of participants from Canada this year were Bialik High School's Grade 9 trip and Canadian Young Judaea's Biluim Israel.

For information on Israel programs or for a copy of the Youth and Hechalutz department's 1996 edition of the Complete Guide to Israel Programs for Youth in Canada, dial 416-398-6931.

ISRAEL

Soldier Killed in Lebanon

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier was killed and six others wounded last Wednesday as fierce fighting raged in southern Lebanon.

Three South Lebanese Army soldiers were wounded and at least three gunmen, believed to be from the Amal Shi'ite movement, were killed.

Sgt. Eran Tsabag, 20, was the 23rd IDF soldier to be killed in Lebanon this year.

Talks on Jerusalem

JERUSALEM — Senior Israelis and Palestinians have been quietly discussing the future of Jerusalem for the last year, in preparation for the final-status talks scheduled to begin in May, a Palestinian negotiator said last Wednesday.

"Over the last year, there have been talks in different places, including in Jerusalem," said Ziad Abu Zayyad.

This was the first mention of such talks by either a Palestinian or Israeli official. Israeli leaders have been insisting that Jerusalem would not be discussed with the Palestinians until the final-status negotiations begin.

Those close to cabinet minister Yossi Beilin acknowledge that they have been drafting plans on Jerusalem and discussing them with their Palestinian counterparts.

Tsaban Rapped

JERUSALEM — Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban was severely criticized last week by Orthodox MKs for having participated in the Reform wedding in the United States of an Israeli couple who could not marry according to Halachah here.

Tsaban emphasized that his presence at the wedding in Atlanta was personal, and that he had not represented the government.

"I'm in favor of civil marriage and each person being able to marry according to his conscience," Tsaban said. "There is no option but to permit civil marriage, at least for those not eligible for religious marriage. The days of the Orthodox monopoly are over."

IAF Invites Women

JERUSALEM — Israel's air force has invited female soldiers to try out for its pilot-training course.

Last week's invitation came in the wake of a High Court of Justice ruling in November, which said 23-year-old Alice Miller must be allowed to take the qualifying exams for the course.

The South African-born Miller began her legal battle to become a pilot two years ago.

Israeli air force officials argued that because of pregnancy and motherhood, women do not serve long enough in the air force to justify the investment in making them pilots.

Brig.-Gen. Yisraela Oron, chief of the army's women corps, told Ma'ariv that other combat units would be opened to women in the near future.

Granddaughter's Deal?

JERUSALEM — Noa Ben-Artzi, the granddaughter of Yitzhak Rabin who gave a heart-rending eulogy at his funeral, has reportedly received a $1 million (US) advance for a book on her relation ship with the slain Israeli prime minister.

Ben-Artzi, 18, will write under the name Noa Rabin, it was reported.

The Rabin family denied reports that Ben-Artzi had signed a contract or received money, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported.

But the deal was confirmed by Marek Halter, a French writer and friend of the Rabin family, who said he will work with Ben-Artzi on the book, to be published in French and English in the spring.

Sculptures Removed

BERLIN — A group of Holocaust memorial sculptures that have been vandalized repeatedly were removed recently from public display.

The 16 sculptures at Berlin's Anhalt train station — in memory of the deportation of Jews during World War II — have been seriously damaged because of recent incidents.

In October, there were three cases of vandalism at the memorial within a week.

Police have five suspects but say they do not think the incidents were motivated by anti-Semitism.

Sculptor Stuart Wolfe said that eight of the 16 sculptures were so badly damaged, they are ready for the garbage dump.

Bicycles for Rwandans

NEW YORK — Rwandans are "gearing" up for their Chanukah gift from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

The JDC is sending 1,000 bicycles to Rwanda so providers of badly needed services, such as social workers and nurses, can better reach people in need, the organization said last week.

The JDC has been providing extensive assistance to war-ravaged Rwandans for more than a year.

Dr. Ruth Westheimer launched the project at a special Chanukah celebration at Rwanda's UN mission.

In addition, bicycle cooperatives will be established in Rwanda so that people will be able to use this means of transportation for such tasks as purchasing food, the JDC said.

CJC urges restraint in peace process debate

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

National executive fails to reach consensus on national unity issue

TORONTO — In the wake of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, leaders of opposing factions in Israel and the Diaspora were asked to tone down the language of their debates in a resolution approved unanimously at the recent Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national executive meeting.

While it was not in the resolution, Canadian Jews were also asked by CJC president Goldie Hershon and by Stephen Victor, head of the Canada Israel Committee (CIC), to refrain from criticizing the Israeli government.

"It is not our role to comment from the sidelines," said Hershon. "We know that words can have consequences, dire consequences."

"As Canadian Jews, we must support the government of Israel with one voice," Victor said.

A motion supporting the current peace process and the Israeli government's method of pursuing it was introduced from the floor by Herb Rosenfeld of Toronto and approved unanimously.

Before the vote on Rosenfeld's motion, David Rotenberg of Toronto said "vast" numbers of Jews in Canada do not support the Oslo accords, but he said he would not amend the motion.

"The Orthodox community has condemned the assassination and I resent the implications of some of the remarks made here about the Orthodox community," he said.

Rosenfeld also called for a moment of silence in Rabin's memory, to which chair Renee Bellas agreed.

After a lengthy debate on national unity, the executive decided to postpone any action until the CJC regional groups have given their views. Requests for more information on the issue were made by many Western and Atlantic community members, including Len Dolgy, Edmonton; Michael Lazar, Winnipeg; Michael Peters, Victoria; Bob Levin, Kelowna, B.C.; and Fred Kuttner, Fredericton, N.B.

But National Unity chair Max Bernard of Montreal made an impassioned plea for Canadian Jews of all regions to set aside their differences in an effort to keep Quebec in Canada.

Bernard said he agreed with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's proposals for distinct society status for Quebec and regional vetoes.

The debate revealed deep concerns about national unity among executive members in Ontario and Quebec, as well as other regions.

"This is not a Quebec Jewish problem but a Canadian Jewish problem," said Joyce Eklove of Toronto.

"If we can't come together as Jews how can we expect the rest of Canadians to do it?" asked Keith Landy of Toronto, a national officer.

"The Jewish community should take a position," said Milton Harris of Toronto. "We need to stand up for a constitutional amendment."

Bernard said, "There is a tremendous amount of anxiety in Quebec," and "a poisoned atmosphere" exists following the close vote in the referendum and remarks by Premier Jacques Parizeau. People under 35 are deciding whether to stay in the province and businesses are making contingency plans in case the situation becomes worse, he added.

"You can cut the tension in Quebec with a knife," said national treasurer Frank Schlesinger of Montreal. "Is it in the interests of the Vancouver Jewish community to see the Montreal community diminished?" asked Schlesinger.

Montreal delegates to the recent General Assembly in Boston "were battered and bruised" by the attitude of many Canadian delegates who implied that they "would not support any special favors for Quebec," said Jack Silverstone of Montreal, CJC national executive director.

Plans for the first Louis Lenkinski lectureship on March 21 in Toronto, in memory of the late CJC officer and labor leader, were announced in a tribute by Rabbi Jordan Pearlson. Lenkinski's wife Helen and son Dr. Lionel Lenkinski were present.

Establishment of the Alan Rose Fund for International Human Dignity in honor of the former CJC officer was announced. The first event will be a symposium on Israel and Arab relations in the Spring of 1996.

Community unites to mark shloshim

Due undoubtedly to the cold rain which fell intermittently all evening, and to a surfeit of community memorials marking the shloshim of Yitzhak Rabin, approximately 150 people were in the auditorium which had been prepared to accommodate twice the number. But the modesty of the number of people on hand did not diminish the impact of the ceremony, which was pointedly and painfully focussed on the man who had been murdered 30 days before and which embodied, in direct but unpretentious manner, the pressing aspiration of the murdered man's people: unity.

The service was sponsored by a number of organizations representing a broad spectrum of political philosophy and religious observance: Associated Hebrew Schools, Netivot Hatorah Day School, Ulpanat Orot, Yeshiva of Hamilton, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Betar/Tagar, Bnai Akiva, Habonim/Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, Israel Aliyah Centre, Jewish Campuses Service, Mizrachi Organizations of Canada, National Conference of Synagogue Youth/Orthodox Union, One Israel/Canadian Friends of Yesha, Young Judaea, Youth & Hechalutz Department/WZO.

The service had a dual purpose which was succinctly but eloquently expressed by the chair of the program, Rabbi Yitzchak Witty, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. It was "to pay honor to one who was a defender of Jews, who was so often in his life prepared to lay down that life so that others would live in peace ... and to remind ourselves of the unity of klal Israel, that there remains always more which unites us rather than which separates us."

What followed Rabbi Witty's invocation was a thoughtful weaving together of more than a dozen different strands of observance and dedication into one bold fabric of community commitment. Elements of a traditional service were joined with the non-traditional.

In keeping with the inclusive nature of the memorial, two eulogies were delivered, one by Simon Rosenblum of Peace Now, the other by Rabbi Pinchas Brumer, the Hebrew Studies principal at the Associated Hebrew Schools Junior High.

Rosenblum spoke of Rabin and of the political process he had set in motion. He praised Rabin as "one of the great Jews of history ... Though not all shared Rabin's views," he said, "all mourn his death with passion and conviction." He called upon the assembled "to protect Rabin's legacy," which he defined with precision. "Mainstream Zionism has always supported, for practical reasons, the partitioning of this hotly-contested piece of land. The continued occupation of the West Bank is a threat to Israel's democratic nature and to its moral dimension." It was a heartfelt, sincere speech. But because it was also "political," it covered a terrain which, though very important, had been already well travelled.

Rabbi Brumer's eulogy was a cry from the heart, tearing, as it were, a corner of the national garment, and pleading for a national response. He spoke in a rhythm which was biblical in its cadence; and he built a spiritual structure which was biblical in its symmetry.

He started by speaking about the physical consequences of the murder. "There are no words of consolation for Leah Rabin and her family; there are no words of consolation for the members of the cabinet ... for the members of the Knesset ... for the Israeli public ... for the Jewish people ... for myself.

"I never thought anyone of us would live to see the day when the word 'hate' would take on real meaning between Jew and other Jew. We have reached the point where absolute hatred has taken place, where brutal murder has taken place against a prime minister, a leader, a hero."

Then he spoke about the murder's spiritual consequences. "There are no words of consolation for the Torah. Some madman, angered by his own mad vision, by his hatred, decided to be judge, jury and executioner, to hold up the holy Torah to shame and to ridicule. The Torah has been dragged through the mud. That we should live to see the day when the Torah has been dragged through the mud..."

But he did not shy away from the truth. "We have to come to terms with this terrible tragedy, though we do not yet fully understand what or why it happened."

As a prescription, he drew from the depths of his faith. "Rav [Avraham] Kook pointed out that people tend only to see one aspect, one side of the larger reality. Thus, they prefer to remove or to dismiss what they cannot see ... The fate of the people of Israel rests with the State of Israel. But the fate of the State of Israel rests with God. God will decide that fate not on the basis of how we behave politically, but rather how we behave toward one another."

At the end of the evening, what was imparted was the message of who took part. Theirs was an act of example, not merely a statement of intent. - MBD

Display disappoints JSF

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Palestinian Solidarity Day exhibit at York University on Nov. 29 has resulted in controversy on the North York campus.

Mike Nadler and Ira Haberman, president and executive vice-president respectively of York's Jewish Student Federation (JSF), issued a news release expressing "disappointment" with the display mounted by the York Arab Students' Association (YASA) at the East Bear Pit of Central Square.

Maps, books and leaflets at the display "perpetuated myths about Palestine, Palestinians, Israel, Israelis and Zionism," according to the release.

The Jewish students took particular exception to "negative references to Israel and its Jewish inhabitants" and to a map of "historical Palestine" which did not acknowledge the existence of Israel.

The Jewish and Arab student groups have a relationship which is "usually good," said Nadler, although similar problems have arisen with past YASA displays.

In fact, Mona Hewaydi, a coordinator for Palestine Solidarity Day, stopped in at the JSF to borrow display boards prior to the event, even offering not to post material of which the Jewish group didn't approve. (YASA did not end up using the JSF's boards for Palestine Solidarity Day.)

Hewaydi was disturbed by a Dec. 6 article in the Excalibur, York's student publication, which she termed "insulting to both sides."

She said she was misquoted in the article, which indicated that she had said, "We weren't concerned if we were offending anyone, we were presenting facts." Hewaydi was indeed very concerned about the possibility that people would be "hurt or insulted," she said.

She also took exception to the illustration accompanying the Excalibur article, which depicted "two people with ugly faces hollering at each other."

YASA's decision to remove the offending map "had nothing to do with the material being inappropriate," but rather with repeated JSF complaints, according to Hewaydi. She stressed the "historical" aspect of the map and noted that it was one of two maps, the other of which "openly acknowledged the State of Israel."

Both groups indicated a desire for future dialogue, to be pursued after this month's exams are over.

Reform Jews sign social justice document

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two members of the London Jewish community with ties to the Reform movement have signed a document calling on the Ontario government to show greater concern for the province's disadvantaged citizens.

And in Kingston, members of the city's Reform congregation have been circulating a petition calling on the members of the Ontario legislature to "take into account the suffering of the underprivileged residents of Ontario."

Stephen State, assistant professor at Huron College in London, and Rabbi Joel Wittstein of London's Temple Israel signed the interfaith document titled, Call For Social Justice.

State, the former national action coordinator of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), said the London document was "designed to get people to reflect on [budget] changes and the direction of public policy from the perspective of their faith communities.

"I feel strongly that the Conservative economic agenda is undermining a sense of community and that is at odds with Jewish mitzvah and practice. It's the wrong policy direction ... It's leaving things to the marketplace."

Pointing to the biblical injunction requiring farmers to leave the corners of their fields unharvested, State said, "The Torah said the surpluses from our fields belong to the poor ... Welfare respects the notion of entitlement of need.

"There's also a long tradition in Judaism of the ethical treatment of employees," he said.

The two-page document recognizes the need for fiscal responsibility but also states, "Paramount is the need to move our focus from individual materialism to the spirit of interdependence and moral obligation.

"We cannot allow an undue burden to fall on the poor, the unemployed, the marginalized, the young, or the challenged in our society; nor can we deprive any person or group of the basic right to share in the wealth of the province. The measure of a society is the way in which we care for the least advantaged."

Moving to specifics, the document asserts several "rights," including:

- the right to adequate social services and assistance;
- the right of workers to freedom of association and to pursue forming a union without fear of persecution.

The document is signed by members of the London United Church, the Roman Catholic Church, the Ontario Federation of Labor, and by State and Rabbi Wittstein.

In Kingston, Marion Marks, chair of the social action subcommittee of Congregation Iyr Ha-Melech, said she began circulating a petition after the Ontario government announced a 22 per cent cut to welfare recipients.

The petition asks the legislature to consider the suffering of the underprivileged in Ontario, particularly children, to rethink the cutbacks and postpone the promised 30 per cent tax rebate.

The petition was circulated among members of the congregation at an interfaith meeting, and in an international student house at Queen's University, Marks said.

"I thought it was very wrong morally to take money away from the poorest people and at the same time promise a rebate of taxation," she added.

Israeli society ostracizing religious Jews: rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It only takes 40 shekels to "buy stigma" in Israel today — 20 for a kippah sruga, the knitted yarmulke that is the symbol of the religious Zionist, and 20 for a tallit katan, whose fringes are an outward sign of Orthodoxy.

That, said Rabbi Mark Dratch, was the finding of a non-religious reporter for the Israeli newspaper, Yediot Achronot, after he completed an undercover assignment.

Speaking to an audience of over 200 at a Toronto Emunah Women Salute to Volunteers dinner held recently at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Rabbi Dratch told of the reporter's experience.

The reporter found himself ostracized by the non-religious and distrusted by the religious, who feared he was an undercover agent of the Secret Service.

In the popular world press, Rabbi Dratch said, Orthodox Jews are "now part of the list of people who kill — people who can't be trusted."

It has become easy for people to point fingers at the Orthodox, he said — to demand that the yeshivot hesder — "the cream of Israeli youth" be closed.

The tension between the religious and non-religious did not begin overnight, he said. But "the assassination is an excuse for many people to say what's on their mind."

It is wrong, he said, to dismiss the hostility as politically motivated or due to prejudice. Rather, Orthodox Jews should work at following Torah in a way that brings honor.

"Even if what we are doing is right, even if our principles are above reproach, we must behave in a way that makes people respect us and think well of us.

"We must be clean and above suspicion in the eyes of Israel and of G-d," he said.

The challenge facing religious Zionists, he said, is to balance meticulous observance of Torah with the imperative of shalom bayit (family peace).

Dinner honorees Lou and Dorothy Zeifman, who have been active in the Jewish community and Shaarei Shomayim, and have been respectively past president of Toronto Mizrachi and president of Toronto Council of Emunah, were praised by Max Shecter and daughter Lilli Tammam for their "spark of leadership" and for "believing that by getting involved we can make a difference."

In his reply, Lou Zeifman urged the audience to "dedicate Chanukah to the pursuit of shalom between our own people and between all peoples."

Dorothy Zeifman, in an emotional response, noted the challenge to volunteer organizations to raise money in difficult times. "We are always searching for solutions. We can't look back," she said.

Govern, don't bully

The right to govern is not the right to bully. Premier Mike Harris seems to have become confused on this point. How else can one explain the government's objectionable use of its majority last week to attempt to strong-arm through the Legislature Bill 26, a 211-page document purporting to amend more than 40 statutes? Many of the amendments were substantive and not of the "housekeeping" variety. The bill has been criticized by a wide array of informed citizenry, including the Privacy Commissioner of Ontario, the Ontario Medical Association, the Ontario Teachers' Association, religious groups and various social activists. All describe the bill as being far too invasive.

Graham White, professor of political science at the University of Toronto and veteran observer of Queen's Park, describe the bill thus in the Globe and Mail: "There has been nothing with this kind of sweep before in this province or others."

As if to prove the point, one need only have observed what was probably thought to be observably impossible, namely, the sight of the two opposition parties banding together to prevent the sergeant at arms from expelling Liberal MPP Alvin Curling from the chamber, and thus thwarting the government's immediate legislative objective.

Given the size of the government's majority, there is no doubt it will eventually push ahead with its program and its policies, as is its democratic right. However, it must be reminded that parliamentary democracy also reserves an important role for the opposition. They speak for and represent the views of the electors who did not vote for the government, as is their democratic right too.

The government should govern, not bully.

Within weeks, Syria?

With the end of the shloshim of Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres steps into the spotlight. He has cobbled together a new cabinet and is still exploring ways to broaden its base. He has spoken clearly on the record about his vision of a Middle East at peace and of the economic potential which peace would unleash.

For the time being, Israeli public opinion seems solidly on his side. A poll published last week by Ma'ariv indicated that Peres would attract 55 per cent of the direct vote for premier as compared with 31 per cent for Benjamin Netanyahu.

Political columnists have been speculating that the prime minister wants to capitalize on this rare popularity by achieving a breakthrough in peace talks with Syria. Indeed, the Syrian "track" was one of the major items Peres discussed with President Bill Clinton earlier this week in Washington. Writing in Ha'aretz last week, veteran observer Joel Marcus stated, "It is hard not to see that something is happening between Peres and [Hafez al-]Assad. We should not rule out the possibility that very soon ... a dramatic development will erupt like boiling lava in the heart of the freeze created between Israel and Syria. That, at least, is what Peres wants. That, at least is what Clinton wants. Both face elections that will decide their political fate...Peres' aim is a big move, if Assad is really willing to go with him. To reach this, Peres wants to shake up the entire structure of the talks."

In an interview with Yediot Aharanot, Peres gave no indication how he would "shake up the talks," but he did attempt to clarify his position regarding negotiations with Assad. "The Syrians should offer Israel what's really important for her – an end to the state of war in the Middle East, a solution of final borders, water, security and economic content in our relations."

The question which columnists are asking is this: In trying to move quickly to find common ground with Syria, is Peres taking the people to where they psychologically and emotionally already are, or to where he believes they will be? But until Assad steps up and forward, the question is merely academic. As Marcus rightly pointed out, the approach of 1996 elections will be a determinative factor. Thus, if Assad decides to act, he will likely do so within the next few weeks. But then again, he may not.

CHANUKAH POEMS FROM OUR READERS

For Avi

365 days ago
the first night of Chanukah.
we announced your impending arrival, sharing our precious news with those who had brought us into the world.

we glowed with our news and expressed it via a poem,
a few stanzas of verse.

that Chanukah night
we had lit only one candle and the shammash,
yet the room
was made much brighter
by our words.

smiles, tears, embraces,
exclamations of delight, captured in our memories
as we awaited our miracle.

Avshalom Joseph.
born June 14.

Avshalom.
"Father of Peace."

Joseph.
"He shall add."

you do reflect your name.
a peaceful child who has added to our lives
a certain magic,
a happiness that knows no bounds.

and as we will celebrate our first Chanukah together, we will be watching
your "lichtig" face,
your bright eyes,
and we'll smile as we say,
"Shehechiyanu v'kiymanu v'higiyanu lazman hazeh".

Pearl Saban

Chanukah

The best holiday ever,
I hope peace will come here and stay forever.
Candles shine
In all there are nine
On Chanukah we give God our word
That our tradition will not be forgotten;
it will be observed
We all have our way
That's how it will stay.
We go to different synagogues and pray different ways,
But the message God sends us stays.

Lesley Black, 10 years old

Chanukah

It's fun
You get to light candles
You get gelt
My zayde comes
But not this year
Cause he died.

The Chanukah Answering Machine

Hello, today is Chanukah
I'm sorry we can't take your call
We're either celebrating Chanukah
Or we're just not home at all.
Another word for Chanukah
Is the festival of lights
We celebrate Chanukah for eight long nights
Chanukah is the holiday Jews like to keep Anyway just leave your number at the beep.

Ira Parker, 10 years old

Chanukah Candles

Eight little candles
All in a row.
It's a holiday - Chanukah,
Don't you know?

On the first night, one
On the second night, two
Eight little candles
Burn the whole night through.

Chanukah

Presents, chanukiot and chocolate gelt
I'll never forget how the latkes smelt

Everyone remembers the Maccabees' war
When they fought for their freedom and more

I look and see the candles glow
I glimpse outside and see the snow

What is Chanukah all about
It's my favorite holiday without a doubt

The holiday lasts eight days a year
We remember how the Maccabees fought without fear

We light the candles one by one
My brothers and I find it so much fun.

Ari Sargon, 12 years old

Senesh a symbol of cost of building Israel

By GARY LEVINE

The story of Hannah Senesh — or at least the bare bones of the story — is known to every school child in Israel and, one would hope, to all students of modern Jewish history. She is a symbol to many of the terrible but indispensable cost of the building of the Jewish homeland, of "the match consumed in kindling flame."

But for all of that, the fact is that in many ways, Senesh was a very typical young woman.

Born in Budapest in July 1921, the daughter of a well-known Hungarian writer, Senesh's family was economically comfortable and largely assimilated. Her father died while she was still quite young, but she was very close to her mother and her brother George and her youth seems to have been spent happily. She attended an excellent school where she had many friends, Jewish and non-Jewish, and was always near the top of her class academically. She shared her family's dedication to culture, read widely and regularly attended the theatre, the opera, the ballet. She was, as well, popular in the great flurry of parties and dances which made up the social life of her peers. Both with and without her mother and brother, she spent frequent holidays at the country estates of friends and relatives.

In her diaries, which she kept faithfully from the age of 13, she writes of the books, the parties, the plays, boyfriends and girlfriends, school and holiday. She speaks as well of her growing interest in poetry and the successes of her early poems.

"Today was the last day of school," she writes just before her 16th birthday. "I got As in everything, but what I'm happiest about is that my poem, Dance of the Moments, was awarded 10 points. Saturday I went to the Berzenyi ball. It was very pleasant and I danced a great deal."

But the political times were changing in the Hungary of 1937, and while a certain separation between Jews and non-Jews had always existed, the growing influence of Hitler on European life had become more and more evident.

In September 1937, Senesh was elected by her class to the school's literary society, only to have the election set aside by the society which, Senesh writes, "clearly indicated that they did not want a Jew — me, that is — to become an officer, which hurts me very much."

Gradually, as the position of the Jews in Hungary began to be threatened and then to deteriorate, Senesh's reference to the politics around her and to herself as a Jew become more frequent in the diaries: the German occupation of Austria in March 1938; the debate on "The Jewish Bill" in April of that year, which reduced the economic participation of the Jews of Hungary and identified the "relegation (of Jews) to the background" as "a national duty;" the Munich Agreement in September.

"I don't know whether I've already mentioned," she writes in her entry of Oct. 27, 1938, "that I've become a Zionist."

No, she had not mentioned it before; and, while she claims in retrospect that her belief in Zionism was "a somewhat gradual development," it seems clear the it was her self-respect and strong sense of independence which guided her to the only political option available that would permit her to retain her pride and dignity in a world which was rapidly conspiring to deny her, as a Jew, any value as a human being.

From this point on, her diary turns more and more to her desire to be in Israel, to her plans for aliyah. Protestations of "the only thing I'm committed to, in which I believe, is Zionism" appear frequently. She participated more and more in local Zionist groups, dedicated herself to learning Hebrew and finally applied to the Girls' Agricultural School in Nahalal, Palestine. She received her letter of acceptance on July 21, 1939.

"I've got it, I've got it — the certificate! I'm filled with joy and happiness! I don't know what to write; I can't believe it. I read and re-read the letter bearing the good news; now I can't find words to express what I feel. I have no feeling other than overwhelming happiness."

Senesh arrived in Israel Sept. 19, 1939.

For two years in the Nahalal school, she attended classes on farming and worked in the fields, in the orchards, in the chicken coops. The young poet, the somewhat pampered young woman of Budapest, threw herself unstintingly into the agrarian life of the young country. The sense of this wondrous new world waiting to be fulfilled motivated her and captivated her.

Hannah Senesh as she appeared on her arrival in Haifa, Palestine, Sept.19, 1939 and relaxing at Sedot Yam (inset). Photos from Hannah Senesh, Shocken Books, 1973.

"I was so strongly aware of the beauty of youth in everything I did and saw; in song, in laughter, in boundless energy, in my overwhelming desire to see and absorb everything, to enjoy all the wonders of the Land, to glory in it."

She writes of wanting to live on a kibbutz, of wanting to be a poultry farmer instructor in an agricultural school, of wanting to write and to teach children.

After completing her education at Nahalal in 1941, she joined the kibbutz at Sedot Yam, which was in the midst of planning to build its permanent settlement at Caeseria. Her skills and enthusiasm were much appreciated there and within a short time she had been appointed to a number of administrative positions.

In all of this — the development of her Zionist fervor, her aliyah and her life in the fields from 1939 to 1942 — how different was Senesh from so many young men and women who came from the insecurity of a growingly hostile Europe to build the settlements and to farm the fields of Jewish Palestine?

There is a picture of her, taken in Haifa on her first day in her new country. Her face is fresh and innocent, her smile young and confident and very happy. How many other young men and women came off the boats at Haifa with the same youth and confidence on their faces, the same joy and enthusiasm in their hearts?

She was in so many ways very much like so many others. Yet, in other ways, she was altogether extraordinary.

Perhaps it was, more than anything else, the unshakable commitment she felt to whatever she set out to do. She would not turn back; she would not reconsider. The commitment, once undertaken, was a holy cause and must continue, no matter what the hardship, no matter what the sacrifices. One of her comrades wrote:

"She was fearless, and none of us was as positive as she that our mission would succeed. Never once did she consider the possibility of failure; never once did she allow us to become dispirited or discouraged. She would explain with iron logic how we could extricate ourselves from any predicament and her inner conviction would reassure us."

The mission was an attempt to organize Jewish resistance in and aid Jews to escape from her native Hungary.

At the end of 1942, after she had spent a year at Sedot Yam, the war in Europe and the annihilation of Jews continued to intensify and Senesh became desperately concerned about the future of her mother, still in Budapest, and the other Jews of Hungary. She joined a parachute unit — the only woman in the unit — organized by the Haganah and attached to the British army, and trained to work behind enemy lines.

The unit was parachuted into Yugoslavia in March 1944 and worked there with Tito's partisans. Senesh became almost a legend: the woman in the British army uniform fighting with the Yugoslav partisans.

In June, Senesh crossed over to Hungary. By that time, the Germans had occupied the country and the deportation of Jews had begun in earnest. At that point in time, the mission was, at best, very dangerous, and perhaps even futile, but she would not be dissuaded.

"We are the only ones who can possibly help. We don't have the right to think of our own safety; we don't have the right to hesitate. If we don't go for fear of our lives, a million Jews will surely be massacred."

She was captured shortly after crossing the border. The Gestapo very much wanted to know the radio codes with which she was supposed to communicate with the Allies, but she would not tell them. She was physically tortured over five months of captivity. At one point, her mother, whom Senesh had not seen for five years, was brought to the prison and Senesh was told that failure to reveal the codes would result in her mother's torture as well. Senesh refused to cooperate.

On the morning of Nov. 7, 1944, Senesh was informed that she had been sentenced to death. She asked for her right of appeal and was refused. She was told that she might request clemency. She responded, "Clemency — from you? Do you think I'm going to plead with hangmen and murderers? I shall never ask for mercy."

She was given time to write farewell letters to her family. She wrote a number of letters; none was ever delivered. At 10 a.m., she was escorted to the prison courtyard, and her hands were tied behind her to a wooden post. An officer stepped forward with a blindfold, but she refused it with a shake of her head.

She was shot by a firing squad of three. She was 23 years old. Someone delivered her body to the Jewish cemetery in Budapest, where she was buried. In 1950, her body was moved to Israel and is buried in the military cemetery on Har Herzl.

Hannah Senesh, the pretty young girl with the confident smile in that 1938 photograph, inspired the people of her generation, perhaps because they saw in her their own youth, their own spirit, their own passion and struggle; and they saw in her sacrifice the love of the Jewish people for which they lived and for which they, too, might be called upon to die.

But heroes are products of their time, and it is with some fear that we wonder how much the sacrifices of Senesh would be valued today. How much would selfless dedication count in what some have termed the "post-Zionist" era?

In her last days in Yugoslavia, before she crossed over to her death in Hungary, Senesh handed her comrade Reuven Dafne what would become her most famous poem:

Blessed is the match consumed in in kindling flame
Blessed is the flame that burns in the secret fastness of the heart.
Blessed is the heart with strength to stop its beating for honor's sake.
Blessed is the match consumed in kindling fire.

Do we value the "flame that burns in the secret fastness of the heart"?

In 1944, an Israeli television play written by Motti Lerner presented Senesh as a cowardly informer. Lerner explained that he knew that Senesh had never been accused by anyone of having informed, but he felt it important to undermine the concept of "Jewish self-sacrifice to the point of death." It was, he felt, no longer neccessary, even destructive, to view the Zionist ideal in such naive terms. Zionism in our time is perhaps more complex than that, more pragmatic, composed of complicated socio-economic realities and religious demographic projections. Besides, nothing is as simple as good and bad any more, as simple as right and wrong.

We have learned the lesson elsewhere, certainly. Richard Nixon taught Americans that presidents need not be noble. One shudders to think what it is Canadians might come to learn from our current analysis of the leadership of Brian Mulroney. And now, in what may be the deepest abyss in the history of the modern Jewish state, the political movements on the right and left seem to pause only long enough in their besmirching of each other's patriotism to bury our assassinated prime minister.

Perhaps in this brave new world, we have indeed outgrown the naive heroine who would offer up her life to the ideals which burned fire in her soul.

How tragic for us all if we have.

What the rabbi meant

By Jean M. Gerber

About the third session with my rabbi years ago in my conversion class of one, Rabbi Samuel Schafler rebuked me sharply. I had been trashing, in my youthful way, what I saw as the hypocrisy of my future people.

"It is not enough to love Judaism," he thundered, "You must love Jews — all Jews. It's easy to love Judaism. But Jews — it doesn't matter whether you agree with them or not, or even if you like them; but you must love them."

Well, I never understood what he meant until that terrible November motza'ei Shabbat when Yitzhak Rabin was murdered by a Jew who clearly did not love his fellows. In the wake of Rabin's shloshim, it is only now that I understand fully what Rabbi Schafler was trying to teach me.

Because I clearly have not been able to love Jews, all Jews. I first realized it in Israel when we were pushed, spat on and crowded off the sidewalk by gangs of young black-coated men. When my son was nearly trampled underfoot at the Kotel by yeshivah students rushing to get on the first bus after havdallah on motza'ei Shabbat. When our daughter was attacked outside the Jerusalem youth hostel, by a crowd calling her and her friend harlots and sinners. (They were checking in for the night and are anything but harlots and sinners.)

I did not love Jews when my religious friends, gentle people who combine the best of religious and secular learning, were insulted and threatened for "looking" religious (the same friends who took us to hear a Chick Corea jazz concert in Jerusalem and continue to teach us many zmirot and insights in Torah). Nor did I love Jews when it was time to vote on Who Is A Jew, and the worst insults were hurled at Jews by Choice who did not seemingly meet the standard of the rabbanut.

No, I did not love those Jews. I resented them, then feared them, then hated them when they threatened my children and my friends.

How I miss Rabbi Schafler, to whom I might have now turned and asked for the secret of how to find that love he was so insistent upon.

In 1974, we enrolled our son in Paula Ben-Gurion school, a newly-opened elementary school which housed both a memlachti (state secular) and a memlachti-dati (state religious) school. He was in the dati part. After about a week, he informed us that there were two schools there — one for Jews and one for non-Jews. How was this, we asked. Well, he answered, the others aren't wearing kippot. For us as Anglo-Saxons, this was funny, then sad, then tragic, as the magnitude of the chasm between the two segments of Israeli society became manifest.

We could always, however, come back to North America and enjoy the vibrant pluralism that characterizes North American Jewry, can't we — can't we?

It would seem not. Just as I worked my way towards a thriving distaste for the others, so they were coming towards me, like two trains in the tunnel, each without lights on. So we have collided finally, and are left bleeding and dazed by the force of the impact of our two loads of hatred.

Over the years, I have tried not to tell Israel what to do; it is there, we are here, and while the government has not always been to my point of view, they are after all the government of a sovereign country. We rejoiced at the peace process, celebrated each step forward, shared the anxiety of many that terror and danger would accompany it and hoped our friends' lives and children would be spared.

Now to find out that when we rejoiced, others despaired — a horrible word, implying all hope lost, the Temple in ruins, the people banished once again — is to look into minds that seem to occupy another universe. It is beyond heartbreak. It is as if two alien spirits were inside one writhing body, like Jacob and Esau inside mother Rebecca, except that we are both Jacob and Esau.

And then to find that my own community is split by the same poisonous division, that some called Rabin a traitor and despaired — this is almost too much to bear. To think that in Canada there are those who despaired at peace breaking out stunned me. Now we have to find a way back to that sense of community which crumbled without our noticing.

It is because I could not learn the lesson 30 years ago, and because the rabbi could not teach it to each and every Jew in the world, that we stand on this precipice, almost lost to each other. And that fills me with dread, with terror, almost with despair.

Exploring the family album

By Arnold Ages

When Lionel Trilling, the eminent American literary critic, was completing his PhD in English literature at New York City's Columbia University in the 1930s, he inquired of one of his advisers whether he might obtain a teaching position at the university.

Trilling was told in no uncertain terms that the answer would be negative because as a Jew he was an outsider. Since English literature was largely the product of English Protestantism, a non-Christian like him could never be attuned to the resonances of a culture and civilization in which he did not grow up and which was so different from his own. A PhD in English was not enough.

This thinly veiled variant of the classical anti-Semitic argument did not, fortunately, deter Trilling (he became both a professor at Columbia and a major literary critic), but his case came to mind recently when I mentally reversed the circumstances and asked whether a non-Jew could possibly teach Jews anything about Torah. The question is especially relevant in an age when conformity in matters religious is becoming more and more rigid.

Before answering the question directly it must be observed that Jews have already learned much from non-Jews. When the rabbis of the Talmud referred to biblical passages, they did not cite chapter and verse when quoting passages. But today it is a commonplace for all rabbis to provide such references — which originate in a Christian division of the Bible.

Again, it should be noted that until the present century and before the rise of Israeli scholars, the foremost lexicographer of the Hebrew language was probably Heinrich Gesenius, whose 19th century dictionary of Biblical Hebrew and Aramaic went through 16 editions in German and numerous others in English translations and is still used to this day as a valuable source for our knowledge of Hebrew and Semitic languages.

It should also be noted that in the 1937 Hertz edition of the Chumash executed by the man who became the chief rabbi of the British Empire, the author quotes freely in his commentary from 27 non-Jewish Bible scholars. Nahum Sarna similarly quotes from at least that many non-Jewish scholars in his 1989 Jewish Publication Society commentary on Genesis.

How do we then relate to non-Jews who explore the family album we call the Hebrew Bible? It depends, of course, whom we are talking about. Jews can learn little about Torah from Christian scholars for whom our Bible is a merely a trampoline and proof text to be ransacked for passages trotted out to validate another religious system. The litmus test for the non-Jewish interpreter of our sacred texts is his/her ability to see the text in its own terms — without parachuting in a conceptual environment which is totally foreign to the text.

In the last 100 years, such scholars have been few and far between. Gesenius was a rare exception. Today, however, there are more and more non-Jewish scholars who are able to look at the Hebrew Bible as both antechamber and sanctuary and address its particular genius in refreshing and innovative ways.

Some of these scholars, having pursued advanced studies in rabbinical seminaries in the United States and in universities in Israel, are utilizing their knowledge of Hebrew, Bible, rabbinics and Jewish history to extract new nuances from ancient texts. Their approaches, of course, are obviously not the traditional rabbinic ones, but they are often valuable supplements to the existing Jewish understanding of the text.

In this context, names such as Victor Hamilton and Gerald Janzen come to the fore. Their recent magisterial studies of Genesis (Eerdmans) are models of intellectual probity and depth of Hebraic learning. Their searching analyses of the world in which the fathers of the Jewish nation lived are illuminating. The works of G. J. Wentham, Richard Nelson and Timothy P. Ashley on Leviticus and Numbers are praiseworthy in their respective efforts to see and recognize the civilization of ancient Israel for its intrinsic values as a unique human collective.

The emergence of this school of non-Jewish scholars who are sensitive to the resonances of Torah is a welcome development. They will help in the future to neutralize some of the anti-Jewish flavor that has crept into Christian approaches to Jewish scripture.

A history like no other

By Rabbi. Gunther Plaut

Hershel Shanks is an American who is in love with Jerusalem. He is also the founder and editor of Biblical Archaeology Review, a popular, richly illustrated journal that is read by Jews and Christians alike, and possibly by some Muslims as well.

Archeology is one of the cultural pastimes of Israelis. No wonder. From childhood on they are exposed to the biblical landscape — both on the printed page, which tells of ages long gone by, and in their environment as well. Lectures on archeology are usually packed. I remember once going to a talk by Yigal Yadin who, before he entered politics, was one of his nation's most renowned archeologists. I arrived about half an hour before the announced time of the lecture and barely found a seat in the large hall.

Of all the exploratory excavations in Israel, those taking place in Jerusalem inevitably attract the most passionate attention. Being himself possessed with that passion, Shanks has produced a splendid book, which I just finished reading.

Entitled Jerusalem: An Archaeological Biography, the volume combines pictures and text in a captivating mix.

The opening chapter starts with the pre-Israelite inhabitants of the city. They were Jebusites, a Canaanite people who managed to defend their stronghold against all attempts of the Israelites to dislodge them. Not until David's time was the feat accomplished, but how it was done is a fascinating tale all of its own. (Joab, the king's officer who brought it off, was rewarded for his feat by being appointed general of David's army.)

Not that everything about this story and the others in the book is clear and uncontested. On the contrary, many archeological digs lead scholars to differing conclusions. In fact, that's one of the reasons their work is so interesting, for one's sleuthing talents are constantly challenged.

When you finish this book, writes the author, you will understand a good deal about the 23(!) conquests which the city endured, and you will see:

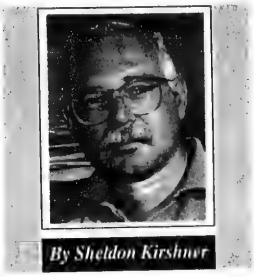
- How the Israelites conquested the city from the Jebusites — three times (twice before King David managed to hold onto it).
- How the Assyrians devastated it after the Israelite confederation broke apart.
- How the Babylonians destroyed it.
- How the Persians defeated the Babylonians and ruled Jerusalem.
- How Alexander the Great conquered the world and Hellenized Jerusalem.
- How Alexander's heirs fought over the city until the Maccabees established an independent Jewish state once again, ruled by the Hasmonean dynasty.
- How King Herod ousted the Hasmoneans and killed their descendants.
- How, after Herod's death, Roman prefects and procurators controlled the city.
- How the Jews revolted and the Romans retaliated and destroyed the city.
- How the Jews revolted again and the Romans banned the Jews from Jerusalem and rebuilt it as a Roman city with a new name.
- How the city became Christian under Byzantium.
- How the Muslims ousted the Christians.
- How the Crusaders ousted the Muslims.
- How the Muslims ousted the Crusaders.

That's how far the book goes, all 256 large-size pages of it. It will make a good read and a fine gift.

The Kirshner File

A saga of life's uncertainties and changes

Bizarre and poignant stories have emerged from the rubble of the Third Reich. Some are stranger than fiction.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Eric Koch's is one of them.

"A writer looks for a subject and this subject was in my blood," said Koch in an interview.

The topic whose murky depths he plumbed was his family closet, or more precisely, the skeletons in it. Peering deep into its recesses, Koch — a German Jew who has resided in Canada since 1940 — was startled to learn of two long-lost, illegitimately-sired, half-Jewish relatives in Nazi Germany.

Hilmar, Koch's step-cousin, was a tragic figure who was consigned to Auschwitz because he was unable to prove his Aryan paternity.

Odette, his half-sister and the wife of a Nazi party member, died of natural causes without realizing that she was of partial Jewish ancestry and that she was related to Koch.

A former Canadian Broadcasting Corporation producer and administrator, Koch relates this incredible, convoluted and touching tale in a new book, Hilmar and Odette (McClelland & Stewart). Koch's Byzantine story, told with the skill of a deft writer, intially unfolds in the early decades of this century.

In 1911, Koch's father, Otto, then unmarried and a partner in his father's jewelry firm in Frankfurt, consummated a love affair with Emmy Herold, a gentile sales clerk. When she became pregnant, Otto's uncle, Louis, introduced Emmy to Baron Moritz von Maucler, a down-at-the-heels southern German aristocrat.

In short order, the baron married Emmy, who named her child Odette. Why a man of his class would marry a supposedly "common" woman like Emmy is debatable. Perhaps he needed money, and Louis may have helped. Odette was raised in comfortable surroundings and her mother never breathed a word of her origins. Maucler, an officer in the German army, was killed on the Western front in 1918.

Koch's father, a war veteran and sportsman, died in 1919, when Koch was three months old. About a decade later, Koch's mother, the widow Ida, met a Jewish businessman named Emil Netter. They were married in 1930.

The plot thickens when one of Netter's sisters, Helene, accompanied her mother, Anna, to Switzerland in 1919. There, one morning, she found her daughter in bed, unconscious, drugged and apparently raped. A year later, Helene gave birth to a boy, Hilmar (originally Robert), whom she gave up for adoption to a Luthern minister and his wife, Hugo and Hedwig Wailke.

How can Koch be certain that Helene was impregnated by a non-Jew? "If there was a rape, the statistical probability is that the rapist was not a Jew," he said.

The apparent rape, however, may have been a concoction to cover up an illicit love affair, he speculates. If this is the case, Helene's paramour was probably a Jew. But no one will ever really know the truth.

In any event, Hilmar, uncircumcised, arrived at the Wailke household without a baptismal certificate.

Hedwig Wailke was a stereotypical stepmother in that she disliked her adopted son, Hilmar. In March 1939, six months before the war broke out, she informed the authorities that Hilmar was actually a Jew. She was neither a Nazi nor an anti-Semite, Koch suggests. But she was doubtless affected by Nazi propaganda.

Once the war had erupted, Hilmar volunteered for the Wehrmacht. He was rejected, having been declared unworthy because he could not prove his father had been a racially pure specimen of German manhood. As a result, he was classified as a mischling, a half-Jew, with all its dangerous consequences.

In 1941, Hilmar met Brunhilde, a German woman. Her father, an anti-Nazi, was murdered in Hitler's euthanasia program. Hilmar and Brunhilde fell in love, but the couple was not permitted to wed as he was of Jewish ancestry. Nevertheless, they lived together and had two children, whose legitimacy was recognized after the war.

Hilmar's precarious existence was dealt a fatal blow in January 1944, when he was declared a Volljude, or full Jew. Toward the end of the war, he was sent to Auschwitz, then brutally marched to the Mauthausen concentration camp. He died in July 1945.

By contrast, Odette enjoyed a charmed life, never being considered a mischling. After all, on the face of it, she was a pure-blooded, aristocratic German.

In January 1939, she married Hanns Arens, a freelance writer, editor and bookseller who had joined the Nazi party in 1937 and contributed occasional articles to the Volkische Beobachter, the leading Nazi daily of the day.

A guest at their wedding had been Hans Hinkel, an official in the Ministry of Propaganda charged with purging the arts and media of Jews. Being Hinkel's friends, Odette and Hans hobnobbed with Nazi bigwigs.

Koch — who left Germany bound for Britain in 1935 and was later interned as an "enemy alien" in Canada — stumbled upon Hilmar and Odette by chance.

In 1951, Koch's mother received a letter from a lawyer in Switzerland informing her that she had been named one of Anna Netter's heirs, but that the will had been challenged by Brunhilde Netter, Hilmar's wife.

Eventually, Koch's curiosity was piqued by Hilmar's plight and, in time, he made a point of meeting Brunhilde and her daughter, Gudrun, who had tried unsuccessfully to enlist in the Israeli army.

Koch first learned of Odette in 1985 from a relative in Germany, an aging cousin in Frankfurt who had been 18 when Otto Koch died.

With the assistance of Mia von Maucler, the last surviving scion of this ancient clan, he tracked down Odette in Munich. Koch visited her in 1989, but refrained from divulging any sensitive family secrets.

"She would have been shocked out of her mind had I told her she had been an illegitimate child," said Koch over coffee and cake in a Toronto cafe. "The worst blemish in German society is to be of humble origin. Besides, it would have been a terrible piece of news to someone who had flirted with the Nazis."

In fact, Koch intended to break the news to Odette sooner or later. To his regret, she passed away before he could bring himself to do so.

Originally, Koch wrote Hilmar and Odette in German. But when his publisher in Germany unexpectedly rejected the manuscript, he turned to McClelland & Stewart, which had published several of his previous books.

Koch is a regular visitor to Germany because his daughter — a translator — lives, and feels completely at home, there. "I don't quite understand this, but I have no criticism of her."

Reflecting on the erratic course of German history, of which the lives of Hilmar and Odette were merely a footnote, Koch recognizes that the efforts by Jews to be accepted by Germans were essentially in vain.

"What occupies my mind constantly is whether we were living in a fool's paradise. Did we all kid ourselves that there was a real German-Jewish symbiosis?"

Still and all, he remains convinced that Jews in pre-Hitlerian Germany did not delude themselves by the desire to integrate into German society. "Our ancestors were not wrong to think that the symbiosis could work. What German Jews achieved was amazing. Hitler and the Holocaust were not inevitable. You can't predict the future, ever."

He may be right. The saga of Hilmar and Odette is vivid proof of life's uncertainties and vicissitudes.

'Nothing has changed' for prominent Likud hawk

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As Ariel Sharon sees it, the drubbing Israel's right wing has taken since Yitzhak Rabin's assassination has been an exercise in intellectual dishonesty.

And despite one of the most painful episodes in Israel's history, nothing, Sharon says emphatically, has changed for Jewish settlers in Judea, Samaria, Gaza and the Golan Heights.

"It was a terrible thing. Every assassination is a terrible thing. But we have to distinguish between grief, pain and sadness, and our real problems. They have not changed," Israel's hawkish former Likud defence and housing minister told The CJN in an interview last week.

Sharon, still a Likud MK, was in town to raise money for YESHA — the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. His visit was sponsored by One Israel/Canadian Friends of YESHA.

He was to have addressed a community-wide rally, but it was cancelled because it conflicted with several shloshim memorials for Rabin around the city.

As a former general, like Rabin, Sharon sees events in military terms: "Rabin's death did not make the Golan Heights strategically less important. It did not bring the Syrians to reduce by one tank the 4,800 tanks they have, and it has not stopped [the Syrians' acquiring] Scud-C missiles, which have a range of 500 kilometres.

"Israel is not under less danger now than before. The mountains did not become lower. The terror groups have not stopped terror. We have not known one day of quiet since [Rabin's] infamous handshake in Washington in 1993 [with Yasser Arafat]. Since then, 162 Israelis have been killed [in terror attacks] and 800 wounded. Nothing has changed."

Ariel Sharon

Heavy clouds looming

Sharon's ire is raised when he is asked about accusations that overheated rhetoric from the right contributed to the climate of hate which culminated in Rabin's murder.

"I call it defamation. How can one blame a national camp? For using harsh words? Immediately after [Rabin's death], the Labor party and the left started [posting] stickers saying, 'Yes to Peace, No to Violence.' What is the connection between peace and violence? That says if you don't support this peace, which has brought only bloodshed, then you are for violence. That is a twisted thing."

Sharon is quick with a defence for Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, whom he says would make a point at anti-government rallies to call on protesters "not to use harsh words and not to bring out those signs," which showed Rabin in Nazi attire or likened him to Arafat.

"But you have to understand something," Sharon adds. "Tens and tens of thousands of people would participate in those demonstrations. The speakers would stand on a balcony. All the lights are in their eyes. You can't see the people. You can't see the audience.

"It happened to me in Hebron. I noticed a sign that said, 'Rabin is Arafat's dog.' I said, 'Look, if you don't remove it, I won't speak.' And they removed it. But that was very close, where I could see it."

Those who bash the right, Sharon charges, themselves took part in anti-Likud rallies in the 1970s and '80s with signs reading "[Menachem] Begin is a murderer" and "Sharon is a war criminal."

"And no one," Sharon claims, "ever tried to stop them."

The Labor government, "in the most cynical way, is taking advantage of a terrible event in order to attack half the population — Bar-Ilan University [where confessed assassin Yigal Amir was enrolled], the observant and the settlers. It's unbelievable.

"I see heavy clouds becoming thicker and thicker over our democracy ... The nation is divided, not because of [Rabin's] murder, but gradually, step by step, over the last two generations, and becoming wider and wider."

That split has manifested itself most deeply, Sharon feels, between those who have had a Jewish education and have "roots in the land," and "the others," who have become "weaker when it comes to national issues."

But, he notes, there will be no peace with Arabs until there is peace among Jews. On the other hand, he has no compunction in saying that the current government "hates" the settlers.

As for those settlers — 146,000 in the West Bank, 14,500 in the Golan Heights and 6,000 in Gaza, and growing — Sharon has three proposals he says would ensure their security:

- not granting Palestinian autonomy over all Judea and Samaria. Zones where Jews reside, surrounding areas and connecting roads would never be turned over to Palestinian jurisdiction;
- keeping internal security in the territories entirely in Israeli hands, and allowing both pre-emptive Israeli strikes and so-called "hot pursuit" of terrorists in Palestinian areas;
- and removing all Palestinian ministries and government offices from Jerusalem.

In post-Rabin Israel, Sharon agrees that "people should not use harsh terms. But, he adds, "these problems are not within the field of good manners. These are issues of life and death, and no one has the right to try to minimize these problems only because of the grief of this tragedy."

Ontario cuts forcing re-evaluation of services

By MORRIS ZBAR
Special to The CJN

OPINION

The Harris government budget cuts are deep, distressing for many and disorienting. They have dislodged us from our current course of thinking and forced us to carefully consider how we provide essential services and who should provide them.

It's tempting under these circumstances to develop a sense of isolation, concentrating only on our community and how these dramatic government spending reductions will affect us. However, this is not just a Jewish issue. Many communities are feeling the pinch of altered provincial priorities. We are going to get our point across far more effectively by creating a common agenda.

With drastically decreased government expenditures a tough reality, the fight now is to preserve services delivered by a religious or multicultural community to its own members. Without pro-active efforts, agency consolidation could be the next step. That would mean merging service providers so that, for example, immigration assistance for Jewish newcomers, may not be distinctly Jewish. Maintaining "ethno-specific" services is a priority for everyone affected by Queen's Park policies.

That is why the federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region have arranged meetings with representatives of Anglican, United Church, Catholic, Italian and Chinese organizations to pinpoint positions on which we can all agree regarding not only service delivery but volunteers and fundraising as well.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto recognizes and respects the government's priorities. We look forward to a new partnership with the government based on new realities, and with that in mind, we are developing specific partnership projects for the government and private enterprise to consider.

But we expect, in turn, time to formulate transition strategies. We need advance warning of what is ahead. If we have to continually play catch-up, we can neither respond nor plan properly. We also need a more favorable tax environment with larger incentives for charitable giving.

So, what is the bottom line for the Jewish community and everyone affiliated with us? Over the next few months, in cooperation with our agencies, we will be identifying our most important core services and assessing by what means they can best be delivered.

We will continue our outreach initiatives to colleagues in other communities. We will be exploring new revenue sources and new avenues of private sector cooperation. Most importantly, we will be adjusting to life in this new post-spending society, determined to protect the most vulnerable members of our community.

Morris Zbar is director of Community Planning & Allocations for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Dan's menshlechkeit praised

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 900 friends and supporters turned out last week to pay tribute to Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan, this year's Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner honoree.

Proceeds from the 47th annual dinner will establish the Dan Family Arava Development Project dedicated to the memory of Dan's wife Judith, who died in July.

Reclamation of the Arava, part of the Negev desert, will prepare the land for agricultural development.

Dan, president of the pharmaceutical firm Novopharm, was feted as "a man committed to the State of Israel, with vision, understanding, humility, sincerity, warmth, perseverance, optimism, menshlechkeit and klal Israel."

Speaking on behalf of his siblings, Michael Dan, Leslie's son, spoke of the "great joy and deep sense of loss our family is experiencing at this hour." He lauded his father's "great accomplishments as a philanthropist and humanitarian," adding, "and he doesn't do a bad job of selling pharmaceuticals."

Of his late mother, Michael Dan said, "She was a remarkable woman who strove to be unremarkable. Just as the Arava Project needs the help of the Dan family, so does the Dan family need the help of the Arava Project — it focuses our attention on one of the anchoring values of our mother's life — her abiding love of nature and natural beauty."

Leslie Dan, a Hungarian-born Holocaust survivor, has of late made donations to a variety of Jewish causes in and around Toronto.

"Having absorbed the teachings of our sacred books," he said in response to the tributes, "I came to the conclusion that I must engage in charitable activities, to the best of my financial position, because that is one of the most important teachings of our faith."

The head table was introduced by Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF Toronto. Avner Regev, executive vice-president of JNF Canada presented a tribute to Yitzhak Rabin.

Others participating in the program included Cantor Tom Schwartz of Temple Sinai; Israel's consul general in Toronto, Jehudi Kinar; Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El; Sid Halpern, national president of JNF Canada; and Tom Ungar, the newly elected president of JNF Toronto. Dinner co-chairs were Sheila Engel and Jack Gwartz.

Devout Christian founded Jewish club

Young Maccabees honor Coatsworth with lecture

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In 1929, Toronto was a largely white Protestant city that tolerated a Jewish minority living in closely-packed quarters between Queen and Bloor streets.

Jews could not get jobs in the city's large retail outlets and they faced restrictions on joining clubs and owning property.

So when a devout Christian war veteran who had ties to the city's elite befriended some teenaged Jewish paperboys and invited them into his Duplex Avenue home, it was an unusual event.

"They had had no contact with Christians," Alan Coatsworth would recall some 33 years later. "I began to invite them into my home, two or three at a time."

Those young Jewish boys invited some of their friends, and before long, a club was born. Coatsworth called it the Young Maccabees because of his admiration for the ancient Jewish warriors, recalled Irving Himel, one of the club's early members.

Altogether, about 150 young Jews age 16 to 25 were members of the club at one time or another.

On Dec. 11, the remaining Young Maccabees, now in their 70s and 80s, along with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and Temple Sinai's social action committee held the Annual Alan Coatsworth Lecture. Panelists discussed group rights versus individual rights in creating a just society.

The lecture series was inaugurated in 1984 in Coatsworth's memory and to honor his early attempts to foster inter-religious understanding and respect.

Coatsworth, who died in 1967 at age 77, was remarkable in his time for befriending young Jews while not trying to proselytize them. In fact, it was quite the opposite as Coatsworth attempted to enhance the Jewish identity of the young men in the club, Himel recalled.

A statement of the Young Maccabee's purpose makes clear the club's goal was "to deepen the religious instincts of Jewish boys and bid them hold fast to the historic faith of Israel and to inspire devotion to the ideals of Judaism."

The Young Maccabees and Coatsworth exerted a tremendous influence on his life, Himel said. Membership in the club made him a better Jew, because it enhanced his knowledge of the principles behind the Jewish faith.

Alan Coatsworth

Bill Simon, who joined the club in 1933, said, "I derived a certain knowledge of my Jewishness in my formative years ... Coatsworth never tried to get Jews to join Christianity."

A regular feature of Young Maccabees' programs was to invite rabbis, lawyers, writers, musicians and Christian ministers to speak on a variety of topics. Club activities also included sports competitions, especially in baseball and basketball, usually in church-based leagues.

"We played boys we'd never meet except for this club. We [had been] in a Jewish environment, like a ghetto," Himel recalled.

Himel believes the contacts created through sports were like "a breakthrough" into the wider Christian community, something that was one of Coatsworth's main goals.

Several ministers of the United Church who later championed anti-discrimination laws were among those who became familiar with the Jewish community through the Young Maccabees, Himel, a semi-retired lawyer, said.

During the 1930s, Coatsworth helped several young German Jews escape the Nazis. He hosted one of the them, Klaus Goldschlag, in his home while the young man attended Vaughan Road Collegiate. Having won five scholarships, Goldschlag entered the University of Toronto where he studied Oriental languages.

Despite Coatsworth's hope that he would become a rabbi, Goldschlag went on to join the External Affairs Department where he served as a senior diplomat.

"Alan Coatsworth was a rare individual for our times and in the time in which he lived, he was one in a million," Himel said.

$30 million & counting for UJA closing

The 1996 UJA Campaign has topped $30 million to date as it heads toward a target exceeding $35 million. It's one of the largest amounts for any December closing. What's more, UJA's first-ever Three Year Vision Campaign has raised more than $16 million for each of 1997 and 1998.

The Campaign officially closed December 6 with a tribute party for canvassers and the community. However, volunteers will continue to call those who have yet to pledge.

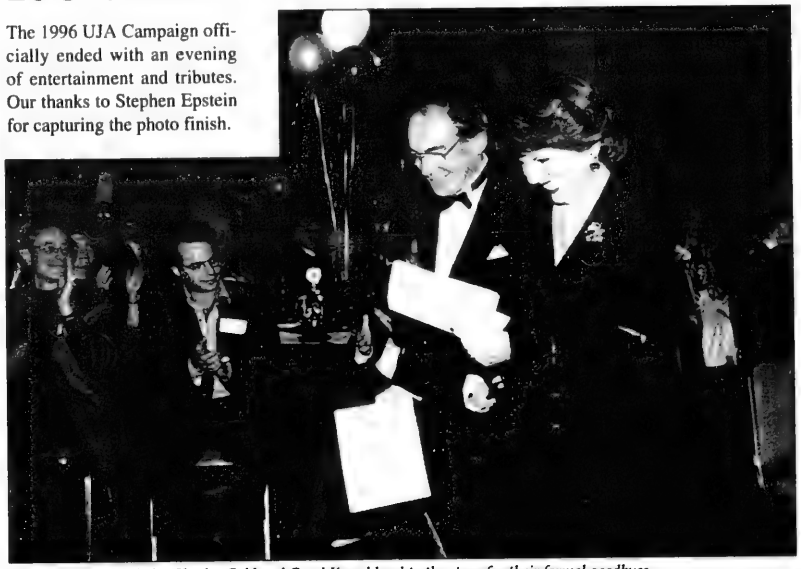
The party was preceded by a blitz day, December 5, in which canvassers mounted a last minute push that pumped an additional $450,000 into the Campaign total.

"Who would have believed that 40% of our donors would have signed up for The Three Year Vision,?" asked Campaign co-chair Carol Kassel in her closing speech to more than 200 party participants. "We wanted to re-invigorate our sense of community and pride," she said. "We realized that we could not do business as usual. You accepted the challenge. You made the vision happen."

"The Three Year Vision is good for the future of this community," declared fellow co-chair Charles Gold, who urged others to assume positions of leadership. "Don't let the challenge pass you by. I suggest that you take a leap of faith."

It's over!

The 1996 UJA Campaign officially ended with an evening of entertainment and tributes. Our thanks to Stephen Epstein for capturing the photo finish.



Step right up. Co-chairs Charles Gold and Carol Kassel head to the stage for their formal goodbyes.

"I'm back," declared Carol to husband Bill, who spent a long year behind the scenes.

A sorting team. Veteran telethoner Lily Tepperman bridges the generations as she shares an award for the best sorter with 11 year old Sarah Brodbar-Nemzer and Jason Kendal.

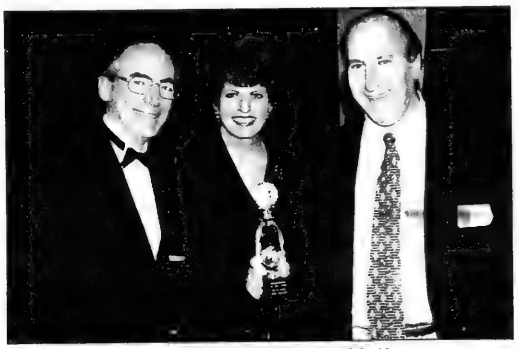
This red robed party infiltrator is none other than "Delta" Dave Engel, whose Delta Force philosophy changed the relationship between canvassers and contributors. Beside him is MC Mark Hebscher, a Q107/Talk 640 sports personality.

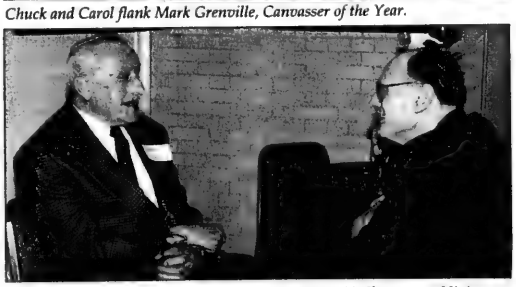
Why is event organizer Lissie Strauss Sanders smiling? She's planning her well deserved vacation.



Chuck and Carol flank Mark Grenville, Canvasser of the Year.

UJA Campaign film star Daniel Proper (R) presents the rookie of the year award to Richard Sadowski who joined Jaqueline Valmont in being accorded the honour.

The party's over. It is time for a rest, as little Leora Newman demonstrates to her mother, Roberta.



Party? What party? Leslie Zack (L) and Murray Hoffman are oblivious to official happenings as they converse in a small corner of the Beth Tzedec corridor.

Phil Givens created campaign milestone

By Howard English

The year was 1967. Phil Givens had just lost his bid to be re-elected mayor of Toronto and Ben Schneider, then Executive Vice-President of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, thought the time was right to talk with Givens. That conversation led to one of the most successful campaigns in United Jewish Appeal history.

Givens, who died Nov. 30, agreed to chair the 1968 Campaign. His term coincided with the Six Day War, which marshalled a massive community response to the emergency. The result was a $14 million campaign - an astounding $11 million more than the year before.

"That was a turning point in the Toronto community campaign," remembered Dave Marks a former Campaign Director, who worked closely with Givens as the head of business and professional divisions for UJA.

"He brought energy, vigour, good humour, his tremendous knowledge of the community and his ability to get along with virtually anybody," Marks continued. "He was just a super guy."

The legacy left by Givens to UJA wasn't just the amount of money raised, it was the number of contributors as well. "We more than doubled the number of donors," Scheider recalled. There were nearly 24,000 when the '68 Campaign was over.

Those associated with Givens acknowledge that personal fundraising wasn't his biggest strength. "I didn't expect him to cover cards. He didn't have that kind of capacity. I needed a motivator - somebody who could lead the Campaign," Schneider said.

"He brought people in and made sure they did what they were supposed to do," added Marks.

Givens' speaking ability was legendary. Stories from friends and former colleagues about his rhetoric are plentiful. One of his favourite lines, according to Schneider, was "I lost the election and blew my chauffeur."

"No matter how many times he said it, the audience roared with laughter," said Schneider.

"He could speak off the cuff on any subject," remembered David Rotenberg, who was a city councillor when Givens was mayor. The two men talked often when Givens' chauffeur drove Rotenberg home from City Hall. Rotenberg noted how well Givens got along with both Jewish and non-Jewish communities. "He didn't get himself involved in controversy," Rotenberg recalled. "You could disagree with Phil and still be his friend."

Givens returned to politics, this time in Ottawa, after his stint as UJA chairman, but he still maintained his Jewish community connections. "He knew what was going on and he gave us guidance about what to do," said Schneider. "If I needed him to reach a politician, he always came through."

Federation committee builds business for Israel

Local business people, seeking more information about Israel's booming economy are discovering how helpful the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Economic Development Committee can be.

The committee, which includes members of UJA's hi-tech, investment, real-estate and construction divisions, was created two years ago to increase awareness about business opportunities in Israel. It works closely with all levels of government and their agencies, the Israel Economic Mission and the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce to build a strong network of information and assistance.

So far, many matches between Canadian and Israeli business interests can be credited to the committee, directed by Meir Klein. It found a Canadian connection for an Israeli auto alarm manufacturer and helped a condominium hotel development in Haifa to get started.

Last year, a committee-organized forum, attended by 600 people, featured former Ontario Premier Bob Rae, who, along with North York mayor Mel Lastman, led successful investment missions to Israel.

Last month, committee members and invited guests were introduced to Yael Varsano-Barzilay, the head of Israel's Toronto-based Economic Mission in Canada. Barzilay thinks the committee is "a great tool to reach people interested in doing business in Israel."

"The Federation's data base and infrastructure combined with our expertise should produce great results," she added.

Economic Development Committee chairman Geoff Pearlstein is excited about the success of past programs and feels "there's a great need for more information about Israel and the region as a whole."

Federation President Sandra Brown called the committee "one of the Federation's best kept secrets."

"Its quiet work", she said, "speaks volumes in terms of returns and the strengthening of the relationship between the Diaspora and Israel."

For more information about the Economic Development Committee, call director Meir Klein at (416) 631-5739.

Gabi Regev, Economic Advisor with Israel's Economic Mission, greets visitors at a forum organized by the Federation's Economic Development Committee.

UJA Meets Minister Wilson

It was a history making meeting - the first time members of a UJA professional division won an audience with the provincial cabinet minister responsible for their profession.

Over 100 doctors from UJA's Physicians Division recently came to Queens Park to talk about the future of Ontario's health care system with Health Minister Jim Wilson. After the Minister presented a brief outline of the government's plans, participants lined up to ask questions about how cuts would affect local hospitals and private practices.

UJA Campaign co-chair Dr. Charles Gold commended the doctors for their "long history of community service" and called the Physicians Division "a pillar of the Jewish community."

Operation Exodus architect, Baruch Gur, a Jewish Agency emissary to UJA, asked the physicians to "remember their responsibilities even during this time of crisis."

Dr. Steven Gottesman, who co-chairs the division with Dr. Howard Price, expressed his appreciation for "an overwhelming response to the program."

So far, the division has raised over $1.5 million for the 1996 Campaign. Many physicians have also pledged for three years.

Potpourri of participants for mega-mission

Thirty buses will be criss-crossing Israel in February as over 1100 Mission 3000 participants, with 350 from Toronto, dominate tourism to the country.

Mission 3000, a United Jewish Appeal/United Israel Appeal project, February 19-28, 1996, will be the largest organized visit to Israel in Canadian history. Participants will be travelling from Israel's northernmost community of Metulla to Eilat in the far south with a stay in Jerusalem, to celebrate the 3000th year since King David designated the city as Israel's capital.

This history-making mission has attracted 200 people who have never visited Israel before and several who haven't been back in decades.

The mission's oldest participant, 81 year old Joseph Jurman, was fighting in the 1948 War of Independence the last time he saw Israel. The retired accountant is looking forward to witnessing the tremendous changes he has heard about throughout the years.

Francis Klinger, Ruth Steinhart, Susan Freedman and Estelle Grader wanted to do something "extra ordinary" to celebrate 30 years of friendship and bridge. The answer was Mission 3000. Grader and Klinger have known each other since they were eight years old, living on Grace Street. The four became regular bridge partners when they were young mothers "desperate to get out of the house," recalls Grader. While they were considering a location for their bridge anniversary, Israel came to all of them at the same time.

This will be York city councillor Roz Mendelson's first trip to Israel on a UJA Mission. She's going to, among other things, "show solidarity with Israel during this time of change." She's also anxious to see UJA's Project Renewal sites.

Charles Presley, a non-Jewish Mission 3000 participant, has been involved with Volunteers for Israel since 1988, working on kibbutzim across the country to replace men serving in the army. Presley, who says that until now he's only seen Israel from "the inside looking out," is glad to finally be going as a mission member.

Jill Greenberg and Michael Levy are among an eclectic collection of Mission 3000 participants.

Frisch brings back donors

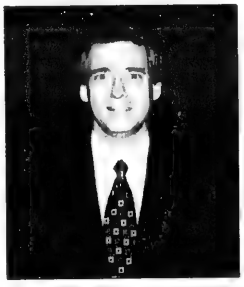
Ron Frisch is dedicated to rebuilding relationships. Frisch is neither a psychiatrist nor a social worker. He chairs UJA's Donor Renewal Committee, responsible for encouraging former contributors to give again.

"It's important for us to understand why people no longer give," he says.

According to Frisch, many people have been hit hard by worsening economic conditions and find it difficult to donate. Others have reservations because of political or community concerns. Either way, Frisch is convinced that opening lines of communication is the best approach. "If you don't have a dialogue you can't get anywhere and this allows us to tackle issues that can be dealt with."

Frisch has served as Vice-Chair of UJA's Major Gifts Division and was co-chair of last year's Major Gifts Gala.

Retrieving lost gifts is one of UJA's major goals, but maintaining a dialogue with donors, according to Campaign Director Ted Sokolsky, is even more important. "For many contributors, UJA is the most important connnection to the community," explained Sokolsky. "So it's important that we do whatever we can to reach out to people and understand their concerns."



UJA Donor Renewal Committee Chairman Ron Frisch.

Rabin Shloshim

Rabin's shloshim marked

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —"I thought that the picture on the front page of the newspaper the day after the peace rally would be of those two bitter rivals Shimon Peres and Yitzhak Rabin hugging," remembered Prof. Michael Bar-Zohar.

"How wrong I was," the former soldier and politician, now a writer and political commentator, told a shloshim service held last week at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am congregation.

He reminisced about the Rabin he knew — shy, honest, with a steely determination to do what he considered right.

To Rabin, peace was what was needed, Bar-Zohar said, even if he had to shake Yasser Arafat's hand in the process.

"He knew he had to do it, but he took no pleasure in it. He wasn't like those Israelis who jump and hug and kiss him — he couldn't forget that Arafat had shed Jewish blood."

No one, he said, can take from Rabin what he accomplished. "He fought for peace, he achieved peace, he was assassinated for peace."

Bar-Zohar had harsh words for those who supported Yigal Amir's opposition to the peace process. "I have real anger against the extremists, including some rabbis, some who came from this country. They said terrible things, even if they didn't mean them.

"[Amir] had tremendous moral support from those who were behind him."

In a partisan shot that had at least one member of the audience muttering "disgusting — he should be encouraging unity, not breaking it down more," he accused the rabbis "not of killing Rabin (I don't think they meant for that to happen) but they killed my faith — they distorted it. I will never forgive those rabbis for doing that to us."

Amir did not achieve his goal, Bar-Zohar said. The assassination "brought an explosion of love especially from the young, the so-called pub and disco generation.

"They didn't care about politics — but they flocked in the hundreds and thousands to the square, to his house, to light candles, bring flowers, cry, and to beg forgiveness from the family for not being there when they were surrounded by crowds shouting that Rabin was a murderer."

The murder, said event organizer Hasida David, speaking in Hebrew, "tore a piece from the Jewish people's heart."

Rabin, she said, "knew how to fulfil every duty he undertook with integrity, dedication and with a simple and unboasted love of mankind.

"The lead bullets that killed you did not murder your courage, the purity of your character, your smile you hope, yearnings and love."

Words of tribute were also offered by JNF shaliach Dov Dekel, Rabbi Philip Scheim, and, in his absence, by Consul General Jehudi Kinar.

Musical tributes were sung by Canter Yehuda Rottner, Israel David, and Limor Tavina and Meytal Golan, who sang a newly revised version of Shir LaShalom, the Song of Peace.

Collective guilt assailed

TORONTO — Orthodox Jews must not let themselves be cowed by the hysteria that has branded them as collectively guilty for the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, says Rabbi Nachman Bulman, dean of men at Ohy Somayach/Tanenbaum College in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Bulman was speaking at a lecture entitled The Rabin Assassination and the Religious Community in Israel held recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill (BAYT). The program was sponsored by BAYT and Ohr Somayach.

The media, he said, has turned into a collective force of vengeance against two million Jews," an attitude that he said has been picked up by the non-religious population.

The danger, he said, is that legitimate opposition and dissent to the Oslo accord is being stifled.

He suggested that the religious Zionists, who traditionally have had fairly close relations with the non-Orthodox community, might have to form closer ties to the haredi community.

"The religious Zionists have been boxed into a corner by trusting the general community too much: the haredi have been boxed into a corner by having no communication with the rest of the Jewish world. — L.S.

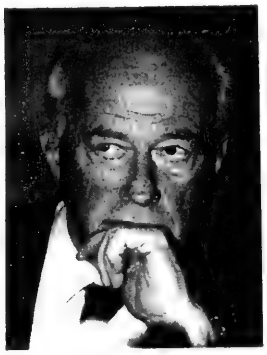
Rabin Shloshim

Israel service for Rabin simple yet moving

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter
and CJN Wire Services

TORONTO — The shloshim services marking the end of 30 days of mourning for slain Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin were simple yet moving, said two Canadians who attended the memorials in Jerusalem.

The graveside state ceremony on Mount Herzl included the laying of wreaths and brief remarks by Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Israeli Defence Force Chief of Staff, Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, said Moshe Ronen, chair of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.



Rabin: Shloshim marked

The services later in the day at Jerusalem's Binyanei Hauma auditorium were nostalgic and emotional, said Julia Koschitzky, world chair of Keren Hayesod, the Jewish Diaspora's main fund allocation arm.

Under grey skies on Mount Herzl, Lipkin-Shahak paid respects to his fallen commander. "Thirty days are not enough time to learn how to live with the pain," he said. "Shalom, commander, we will miss you very much."

More than 100 soldiers in ponchos and full battle gear were deployed at the cemetery, reflecting the tight security that has surrounded government leaders and Rabin's family since the assassination.

PLO leader Yasser Arafat said Rabin's death was a "big loss for Israelis, Palestinians and the peace process. I hope Mr. Peres ... will continue with the peace process."

Binyanei Hauma was filled with thousands of Israeli dignitaries and Jewish leaders from around the world, who had to undergo stringent security checks to enter.

Sitting alongside the Rabin family were the Israeli president, the Knesset speaker, the country's chief justice, members of the Knesset and the diplomatic corps, the military and members of youth movements. Also present were about 200 invited Jewish leaders from 25 countries.

The stage was decorated with a large portrait of Rabin surrounded by hundreds of flickering memorial candles, Koschitzky said.

A video presentation of Rabin's life proved very moving as it traced Rabin's life from his youth, through his years as an underground Palmach fighter, to his days as head of the IDF during the Six Day War in 1967. Also highlighted were his political and diplomatic careers.

"It was a very powerful video that included segments of his family life. It showed his warmth and his personal interaction with friends and family," Ronen said.

A sober note is sounded

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Apprehension that new political alliances in Israel being considered by Prime Minister Shimon Peres will come at the expense of conservative and liberal religious elements was expressed here by Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple.

His concern introduced a sober note to an impressive evening of sacred music, poetry, readings and addresses at Holy Blossom Temple honoring the memory of Yitzhak Rabin and marking the end of the shloshim.

"We should not be lulled into the belief that attitudes have changed in Israel," Rabbi Marmur said.

The memorial, attended by 600 people, heard Dr. Harvey Zimmerman describe the late prime minister as the person "who lifted a state of siege from Israel."

Zimmerman is the chair of ARZA Canada (Association of Reform Zionists), which sponsored the memorial.

Young and old alike in the audience intently followed the words of each speaker and sat entranced by the readings of Psalms by rabbis Nancy Wechsler and Lawrence Colton, the beautiful voice of Cantor Benjamin Maissner, the heartbreaking violin solo by Moshe Hammer (Hebrew Melody, Joseph Achron) and the recital of To Touch Hands in Peace,(an adapted N. Waldman poem) by Natasha Greenberg.

"The protector of Israel neither sleeps nor slumbers," said Dr. Stephen Cohen in his tribute. A key figure in the secret negotiations which led to Oslo I, Cohen said Yasser Arafat's decision to doff his kaffiyeh and visit Rabin's widow Leah during shiva will usher in a new era in Israeli-Palestine relations.

Rabin's assassination is having remarkable results on the political front, according to Prof. David Dewitt of York University, who predicted an important improvement in Israel-Syria negotiations.

"President Hafez al-Assad has acknowledged to the international community for the first time that he is beginning to understand the vulnerability which comes with Israel democracy. Syria will recognize the strengths and weaknesses of Israel," Dewitt said.

Cohen, president of the Institute of Middle East Development in New York, said that for the first time in 19 years, the Labor party in Israel is talking to the National Religious party and that both sides of the debate over the peace process are communicating.

"It is no longer a theological debate," he said.

The reaction of young people in Israel to Rabin's death "proved that Rabin was able to revive the soul of the next generation," he said. "Secular young Israelis do have an inner life and have responded with spiritual upliftment."

Chanukah Greetings from Forest Hill Place

In the Jewish community, the festival of Chanukah is a time for celebration, a time for giving, a time for sharing, and a time for family and friends. During this season, however, some people are reminded about the loneliness that fills their lives. For some seniors, this is especially true if they are living alone while family and friends are located in other parts of the city, the province, or the country.

At Forest Hill Place retirement residence, we understand the importance of friendship and companionship, and we pride ourselves in offering the very finest in retirement living.

At Forest Hill Place, there is always someone close by to share greetings and homemade latkes while enjoying the festival season. Residents and staff join together to kindle the Chanukah lights, and families are welcome to join in numerous traditional events and activities. During the festival of Chanukah, and all year round, the daily social and recreational activities, coupled with regularly scheduled entertainment provide a relaxing, social environment where friendships are made and memories are shared.

Forest Hill Place offers companionship and security.

It's a delight to invite friends and family to share the warmth of Chanukah at Forest Hill Place. Where else can you relax and enjoy the company of your guests while dinner is prepared for you in the elegant dining room? And this is only one of the many services Forest Hill Place has to offer. Housekeeping, laundry services, 24 hour emergency response systems, and 24 hour reception and security, combined with our superb meal services, enhance your peace of mind during the holiday season, and all year round.

Residents and staff of Forest Hill Place wish to extend their warmest greetings for the holiday season, and invite you to stop by and visit any time

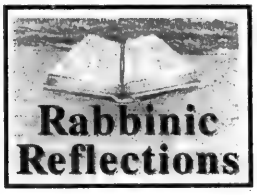
Israel's history of settlers



By RABBI MOSHE STERN

I recently returned from a trip to Israel together with my esteemed colleagues Rabbi Raphael Marcus and Rabbi Yehchiel Benayon and other participants — a "Solidarity Journey" organized by George Meister.

We were there during and after the shivah of Yitzhak Rabin, as we shared with our brethren, the deep sense of sorrow and grief coupled with revulsion that such a heinous crime could be perpetrated by a fellow Jew.

Most of our time was spent in the cities and towns of Yehuda, Shomron and Gaza: places such as Efrat, Alon Shvut, Chevron, Kiryat Arba, Beit El, Ariel, Eylon Moreh and Gush Katif.

A terrible, unfair and distorted picture has been painted with regards to the citizens of these areas. As in any group of people, one can find extreme elements, and this is true of the left and the right. Yet every single person we spoke with — and we met with many — was devastated by the murder of Rabin. In fact, aside from the loss of a fellow Jew, politically, it was the worst thing that could have happened. They knew full well, that though the confessed murderer was a resident of Herzliyah, and not the "settlements," they would be lumped and branded, as indeed they have been, by many inside and outside the government of Israel.

The irony is that these "settlers," whose loyalty seems to be in constant question, have proportionately more of their children serving in the Israeli armed services and in high ranking positions than any other segment of the population of what is called "inside the Green Line."

Most of the 140,000 citizens of Israel who live in Yehuda, Shomron and Gaza settled there at the invitation of a number of Israeli governments. This includes Rabin's first term as prime minister, as well as the governments led by the late Levi Eshkol and by and Golda Meir, who believed "facts" had to be created on the ground in these areas.

In the name of fairness and justice, I ask each Jew to search his heart and soul and think of the following:

Seventy or 80 years ago, there were other "settlers" whom the British called intruders, trouble makers and "obstacles to peace." Their names were David Ben-Gurion, Yitzhak Ben Tzvi, Zalman Shazar.

Where would Israel be today without the courage and determination of those "settlers." The "settlers" of today are simple citizens of Israel, living with Israeli passports, paying taxes to the government of Israel and serving with honor in the armed forces.

Their security is inextricably bound with our security. Surely, now is the time for the entire nation of Israel to unite behind the needs, hopes and aspirations of all of its citizens so that peace will become an instrument of harmony and cohesion and not, G-d forbid, a weapon to divide and tear asunder a land and its people.

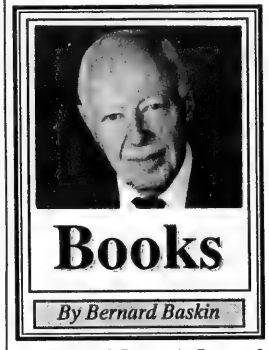
The holiday of Chanukah, which will be observed on the 25th of Kislev, the evening of Dec. 17, is known as The Festival of Lights.

At sunset, when we are enveloped in darkness, we are bidden to light oil or candles. The Jewish answer to darkness, to evil, to hatred, is not the sword or the gun. The answer is light. The light of Torah, of learning, of teaching, of sharing.

Let us together light the chanukiah and replace acrimony with understanding and dispel the darkness of sinat chinom (hate) forever.

Rabbi Moshe Stern is the spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation in Toronto.

Examining the Inquisition



The End of Days: A Story of Tolerance, Tyranny & the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain by Erna Paris, Lester Publishing, $28.95.

The Origins Of The Inquisition In Fifteenth Century Spain by B. Netanyahu, Random House, $75.

Christopher Columbus begins his diary with these words: "In the same month in which their Majesties (Ferdinand and Isabella) issued the edict that all Jews should be driven out of the kingdom and its territories, in the same month they gave me the order to undertake with sufficient men my expedition of discovery to the Indies."

The expulsion that Columbus refers to was so cataclysmic an event that ever since, the date of 1492 has been almost as important in Jewish history as in American history. On July 30 of that year, the entire Jewish community, the largest in the world, some 150,000 people, was expelled from Spain.

In the 14th and 15th centuries, a great number of Jews, many under duress, converted to Christianity, reducing the community by nearly ⅓. Freed from the restrictive shackles of a hated minority faith, these New Christians (conversos) quickly rose to occupy many of the top positions of Church and state. Some married into the aristocracy and penetrated the highest ranks of Spanish society.

The Expulsion was the major aim of the Inquisition (1481) headed by Tomas de Torquemada. He believed that as long as Jews remained in Spain, they would influence the tens of thousands of recent Jewish converts to Christianity to continue practising Judaism. When the Spanish army defeated Muslim forces in Granada, thereby restoring the whole of Spain to Christian rule, the king and queen concluded that the Jews were expendable.

Many New Christians, including some of the most eminent citizens were arrested, tried and condemned to death for heresy. The whole region was gripped by an orgy of denunciation and terror. Even the bones of the dead were dug up and then publicly burned after trial.

The Inquisition was popular, and what is more, it was good business. Its tentacles soon spread all over the country. Many thousands fell under its sway, either losing all their property or else submitting to heavy fines. The Inquisition was fat on the proceeds; and there were few connected with it who did not benefit greatly. It is estimated that 100,000 persons were persecuted in one form or another and that about 9,000 were executed. It persisted into the 19th century with the death of additional thousands.

Erna Paris, a well-known Toronto author, has carefully researched the complex many-sided question of the Inquisition which fused the triple evil of a police state, totalitarian ideology and racial persecution. Deftly and skilfully she indicates how mass superstition, greed, jealousy, political and ecclesiastical controversy as well as class warfare led to the transformation of a once tolerant society.

In closing chapters she draws parallels from the history of the Inquisition to disturbing events in modern Europe and North America.

In The Origins of the Inquisition in Fifteenth Century Spain, the author, an internationally recognized scholar, presents a surprising revisionist thesis. He maintains that most of the conversos were well-assimilated, loyal Christians. They were not crypto-Jews, who were heroes or loyal to their ancestral faith. They were hated because of their Jewish origins and for their economic success and political ascendancy. The Inquisition, then, was not basically instituted to oppose heresy, but the result of age-long anti-Semitic tendencies and propaganda. It was not religious in nature, but racial along Nazi lines.

This major work, over 1,300 pages long, is filled with vivid detail and rich with information on all aspects of a highly involved subject. It represents a scholarly resource for all interested in the Inquisition and Jewish - Christian relations.

Jewish Life

Respect, dignity required in debate among Jews

By KURT ROTHSCHILD
Special to The CJN

How do I, a member of our pluralistic community, deeply committed to National Religious Zionism, relate to the traumatic and tragic events that have shaken Israel and world Jewry?

The assassination of the prime minister of Israel was a mortal attack not only on Yitzhak Rabin but on the integrity of the Jewish people and on the good name and integrity of the religious community, from whose ranks Rabin's assassin came.

Guest Voices

Rabin will go down in history as the man who fought and won the Six Day War, who conquered Jerusalem, who devoted his life to the welfare and security of Israel and who engaged in the peace effort with great courage. His murder is unforgivable by any standards and will remain forever a blot on Jewish history.

This tragic event has unleashed waves of prejudice and hate that threaten every segment of our peoplehood, and put in question the stability of the State of Israel.

In another period of Jewish history, it was internal strife, sinat chinam (fraternal hatred) that led to the destruction of the holy Temple and of the second Jewish commonwealth.

We are well advised to look at the sources of the Tanach, our prophets and sages, who admonish us for our self-hatred and who threaten that the land of Israel itself will spill us out for lack of ethical behavior and brotherly love.

To us, who experienced the Holocaust, which almost exterminated the entire Jewish people, this was G-d's gift and solace to our homeless and decimated nation. It was the culmination of many centuries of Zionist longing and idealism. This is what eternally ties us to the Land of Israel and ties Israel to the Jewish people.

The history of Jewish settlement in our homeland has been fraught with anguish, pain and much bloodshed. We need peace and ask for it in our daily prayer and our greeting to each other is the word shalom.

We engaged in a great adventure when we proclaimed the State of Israel on our ancient land. We have none other. How do we retain this precious gift, our homeland?

None of us have an unqualified answer to this searing question, not even the government of Israel and its military advisors. We all wish for peace with our neighbors, but we have a long way to go before finding a solution to this enigma.

We need a far greater measure of humility in asserting our convictions. The quest for peace is essential, but we cannot deny the right of expression to those who raise questions and who voice opposition. We proudly project Israel as a great democratic country and it would be tragic if the insane action of one or a few would be allowed to create a police state in which rabbis, teachers and ordinary citizens would not be allowed to express their thoughts and concerns.

I have been for many years intimately acquainted with many of the rabbis and roshei yeshivah of hesder yeshivot and I have consistently found them to be imbued with deep feelings of ahavat Israel and ahavat Eretz Israel — love of fellow Jews and of the land of Israel. The product, the graduates of these yeshivot, are a credit to the Jewish people and a mainstay of Israeli society. They, and their wives and children, are people of great integrity and of high moral standing, and of great devotion to the cause of Israel.

We are a very intense people and express opinions at times in a strong, overbearing and insulting manner. The events of these past weeks must teach us to treat each other with respect and with dignity, without abrogating our right of dissent and of opposing views.

None better than King David expressed this everlasting hope:

"Pray for Peace of Jerusalem; May they prosper that love you. Peace be within your walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say Peace be within thee."

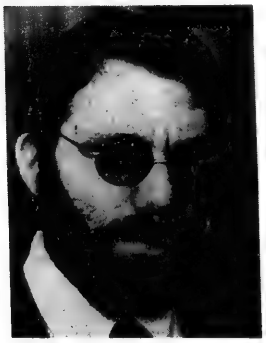
Rabin assassination prompts changes to rabbi's show

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The assassination of Yitzhak Rabin shocked and angered Rabbi Benji Levene. It also meant that he must change his famous "four faces of Israel" act.

The 48-year-old rabbi visited Toronto recently under the auspices of the Canada Israel Gesher Foundation. Prophetically, five months earlier, he chose the title, A Nation Divided, A Destiny United, for his talk at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.



Rabbi Benji Levene

Rabbi Levene, grandson of Rabbi Areh Levin, the zaddik of Jerusalem, has devoted his life to bridging the gap between religious and secular Jews in Israel.

"Unfortunately people have pooh-poohed the importance of this issue, but now they understand it for the first time," he said.

The tragic death of Rabin requires him to change his act, Levene told The CJN, but he is not yet sure how it should be done.

In The Four Faces of Israel, Rabbi Levene plays the part of Rabbi Shlomo Deutch, who supports the throwing of rocks at motorists who drive on the Sabbath; Egged bus driver and Israeli army veteran Motti Cohen, whose idea of a religious experience is seeing Charlton Heston in Ten Commandments; Jean-Paul Simon, a beret-wearing artist living in Tzfat, married to a non-Jew; and Harry Abelson, a fast-talking philanthropic American Jew, who has visited Israel 228 times, but does not want to live there.

In the seminars he holds with Israeli high school students on the need for Israelis to listen to each other, Rabbi Levene said he is sure to be asked how religious Rabbi Deutch will react to the assassination.

"I have some ideas, but I'm not sure what the reaction will be. Up to now I have avoided an answer."

He is more than ever convinced, however, of the importance of his mission.

ביקור מולדת - סתיו 1995

נחתתי בבן גוריון כשבועיים אחרי הרצח. במכה ראשונה נדהמתי כמה לא מתעסקים בכך, ועד כמה חזרו כולם לענייני חולין. אבל במהרה התברר לי שנושא הרצח מבעבע בכל תוכנית טוק שואו , בכל שיחת חולין, בכל עניין בעצם. העניין העיקרי הוא, כמובן- ההסתה, גבול המילים, מה מותר ומה אסור להגיד בדמוקרטיה. בתחילת תוכנית הטלביזיה " פופוליטיקה" הצהירו כל המשתתפים ברצינות שהגיע הזמן למתן את השפה ולהתחיל לסגל נורמות דיבור אחרות וחדשות. אחר כך נאלצתי לעזוב את צפיית התוכנית כדי לענות למספר טלפונים, וחינה בחזרי לצפייה - נדהמתי לראות את כולם נובחים על כולם, צועקים על כולם ומקללים(ממש כך): "שקרן", "בוגד", "נבזה"... אלה היו רק מהמילים היותר תרבותיות ששמעתי שם. את הנרעות יותר פשוט אי אפשר להביא לדפוס. אין מה לעשות! יש משהוא כל כך UNCIVILLIZED בחוויה הישראלית, מין שילוב של בית הכנסת של קתריאליבקה בפולניה עם השוק המזרחי וחוצפה הישראלית. אם גם רצח ראש הממשלה לא מצליח לשנות את הדפוסים האלה - כנראה נגזר עימהם להיות איתנו לתמיד. וזה כל כך חבל, כי יש הרבה אנרגיה, התלהבות ויופי באותה חוויה ישראלית עצמה! ישראל של 1995 היא באמת מקום מדליק לחיות בו, בלי הגזמה! רק חבל שאנשים לא מסוגלים להתנהג כמו בני אדם.

תאנים ותמרים :

זהו שם תקליטו ותוכניתו של זמר הרוק רמי קליינשטיין. זה גם שם שיר הנושא. השיר הזה, דרך אגב, נבחר ל"שיר השנה" ברדיו בראש השנה. כשהציעו לי ללכת לראות את הקונצרט של רמי קליינשטיין אמרתי לעצמי: בטח אהיה האיש הכי זקן בקהל ובטח אחרי התוכנית תצלצלנה לי האוזניים מהווליום למשך חודשיים. אז ככה : באמת הייתי שם הכי זקן, (הגיל הממוצע היה שש עשרה) , אבל לא צלצלו לי האוזניים, ונהניתי, מה זה נהניתי! זוהי אולי הפעם הראשונה בחיי שהלכתי לקונצרט בלי להכיר קודם לכן אף אחד מן השירים, ונהניתי מהם מאוד. רמי קליינשטיין (שהוא בעלה של הזמרת ריטה) הינו מוסיקאי מחונן ביותר שמנגן על פסנתר וקלידים. הקהל השתולל, אך בנימוס וללא פראות. הילדים רקדו, תוך שהם שרים את כל השירים. אחר כך כמובן קניתי גם את הקלטת, ואני ממליץ עליה בכל פה. ואם תגיעו לישראל - לכו לראות את רמי.

חולה אהבה משיכון ג' :

זהו שמו של סרט ישראלי חדש שזכה בימים אלה במירב האוסקארים הישראליים בטקס השנתי. זוכרים את השנים שבהן אי אפשר היה לראות סרט ישראלי בלי לחוש מבוכה? הדמויות נראו בלתי אמיתיות, או פרכיות, או שדיברו כמו בתיאטרון או ברשת א' ברדיו. או הימים האלה חלפו ואינם. יש בסרט שורה ארוכה של שחקנים שעושים עבודה יוצאת מן הכלל, ובראשם משה איבגי, שהוא חולה האהבה משיכון ג' שמתאהב אנושות בבחורה תל אביבית שבאה להתגורר בשכונה. הצד הפחות חזק בסרט, לטעמי, הוא התסריט. הכל הולך בסדר ובצורה אמינה עד אשר הגיבור נשלח להתאשפז בבית חולים פסיכיאטרי. מה שקורה שם הוא בלתי אמין לחלוטין, אם כי הסיפור מסופר בצורה מעניינת. לי אישית, כרופא, מפריע שמשתמשים בבית חולים פסיכיאטרי בצורה בלתי אמינה. לא היה מזיק למפיקי הסרט לקבל ייעוץ מקצועי לגבי איך שצריך להיראות בית חולים פסיכיאטרי. רק לשם דוגמא: כל הבחורות המאושפזות שם מוצגות כניימפומניות (!) דבר שהוא איננו נכון עובדתית ואינו מוסיף כבוד לאף אחד. (אם בכלל - הרי שהתרופות הפסיכיאטריות מורידות את הצורך המיני כמעט לאפס). למרות הביקורת - בהחלט התקדמות. עדיין לא פסגת הקולנוע האירופאי או האמריקני - אבל הכיוון נכון.

רק ישראלי יבין :

פולני, אמריקני וישראלי נפגשו בכנס בינלאומי והלכו ביחד למסעדה. אמר להם המלצר : "סליחה, תדעו שאין היום בשר", הביט בו הפולני ואמר : " מה זה בשר?" הביט בו האמריקני ואמר : " מה זה אין?". חשב הישראלי לרגע ושאל: " מה זה סליחה?".

Victoria CJA grows

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The 1995 Victoria Combined Jewish Appeal has raised $56,634 in cash and pledges as of Dec. 1 from about 300 contributors. Another $1,250 is likely to be raised before the campaign closes at the end of the year. Last year a total of $54,817 was raised.

The United Israel Appeal (UIA) will get close to 60 per cent of the allocations, with the balance to be used for local needs, as determined by the board of directors of the Jewish Federation of Victoria & Vancouver Island.

In making the announcement at a recent federation meeting, campaign chair Chuck Waldman said the number of contributors has increased substantially this year but still represents only 50 per cent of the known Jewish homes in the community.

However, he said, the 1994 UIA campaign, which operated on its own, had reported a 30 per cent increase over the year before.

A demographic survey based on the 1991 census is being conducted by Jean Gerber of Vancouver. It "guesstimates" the total Jewish population here at about 2,000, but the figure may be much higher.

It is estimated that 53 per cent of the Jewish population came here in the past 10 years, with the greatest increase coming in the last five years, when "people seem to be pouring in," Gerber said.

A sampling of some 125 homes showed that the greatest number of Victoria Jews live in the James Bay area, which includes the Parliament Building and most of the downtown.

But there are several clusters of Jewish families throughout Greater Victoria.

Of those surveyed, 82 per cent said they had attended university or vocational school and 32 per cent had graduate degrees. About 38 per cent are in the professions and 17 per cent in business.

Gerber said the 1991 figures show that Victoria is not neccessarily a retirement haven for older people.

The report is a preliminary one and the sampling will continue. A more comprehensive report is due early in 1996.

Michael Peters, chair of the community relations committee, reported that a media relations program is underway to monitor and respond to local media on issues of discrimination, racism and human rights, when necessary. The committee will coordinate information on all candidates and meetings in 1996, in connection with the provincial election which must be held by the fall.

Elected to the board of directors were: Coun. Bob Friedland, Cookie Dubney, Chuck Waldman, Arlyne Kagan, Jon Carr, Stephanie Gilbert, Jon Secter, Louis Sutker, Dr. Stan Shortt, Michael Peters.

Budget forces agency changes

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Drastic budget cuts are forcing Hamilton Jewish Social Services (JSS) to make certain changes, says director Carol Krames.

The agency will be moving to the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) from its $27,000 per year rented quarters in a former public school.

And JSS is facing ever increasing demands from the community for financial assistance and for food, Krames says.

The move also results from the closing of the JSS seniors' workshop after the company which had for many years provided light work was sold and the amount of workshop space needed was reduced.

Based at the JCC from the agency's founding 60 years ago by the late Isaac Segal until seven years ago, JSS moved into its own quarters when the JCC moved from its former east Hamilton location to its new home in Ancaster.

The new JCC is located on a 34-acre property a half-mile walk from the turn-around point of the west end bus route. Access to the building was therefore difficult for JSS members, who are mostly elderly or have disabilities.

The transportation problem has been temporarily solved by a regional bus service for the disabled and bus stop pick-up.

Eventually, says Krames, JSS hopes to purchase a small van.

But her biggest challenge today, she says, is the increased need for help among those she serves.

Although the community's response to the kosher food bank has been very good, demand keeps growing. There are more and more singles and single moms, elderly relatives of recent immigrants, families in crisis and families arriving unexpectedly in search of work and a home, she says.

"Our top priority," she says, "is that no Jewish person goes hungry and that they have a roof over their heads."

It may be difficult, "but we never turn anyone away."

Stamp to honor Man of Steel

By DANIEL KEREN
Special to The CJN

Joe Shuster

OTTAWA — Superman, the comic book hero brought to life by the pen and brush of the late Toronto-born Jewish illustrator Joe Shuster, is being honored with one of five new stamps released last month by Canada Post.

The series includes four other stamps featuring other Canadian comic super heroes. But for many comic book fans, there are just two categories — Superman and all the others.

When Shuster was 10, the family moved to Cleveland, where he became good friends with Jerry Siegel, a neighbor and classmate.

They soon formed a team, with Shuster illustrating and Siegel writing the text for various comic book stories, before they came up with their legendary contribution to 20th century pop culture — the Man of Steel, better known as Superman.

Canada's "Superstamp"

In the last interview he granted, just three months before his death in a modest west Los Angeles suburban apartment from congestive heart failure and hypertension in the summer of 1992, Shuster told the Toronto Star his love for illustrating comic books came as a result of reading the comic panels that appeared daily in that paper.

Finances in the Shuster home were limited, with Joe's father Julius, an immigrant from Holland, struggling to make ends meet with a tailor shop in Toronto's garment district.

At an early age, Shuster displayed a talent for art. But drawing paper was impossible to acquire. His younger sister, Jean Shuster Peavy, who now lives in Albuquerque, N.M., once recalled that their mother Ida, an immigrant from Kiev, was able, from time to time, to get Joe scraps of white paper from the butcher, "but that didn't happen often."

Rather, Shuster would scrounge around, refining his illustrative talent on whatever discarded paper and cardboard he could find. In the mid-1930s, a few years after graduating from high school, Shuster and Siegel managed to sell their first two story ideas to DC Comics.

The first concept was Henry Duval, a swashbuckler; the second dealt with Dr. Occult, a magician. The ideas had been submitted on brown wrapping paper and the back of some wallpaper Shuster had brought with him years before when the family moved from Toronto.

Shuster would later recall that upon seeing the submissions, DC Comics said, " 'We like your ideas, we like your scripts and we like your drawing. But please, copy over the stories in pen and ink on good paper.'

"So I got my mother and father to lend me the money to go out and buy some decent paper — the first drawing paper I ever had — in order to submit these stories properly to DC Comics."

Fame came to the 24-year-old illustrator and his pal with the historic release in June 1938 of their first Superman comic stories in Action Comics No. 1.

It would be nice to end this tale of a humble Jewish artist by saying that within three years, DC Comics was selling more than 1.2 million copies of the Superman comic books monthly and that both Shuster and Siegel became wealthy, living happily ever after.

The sales figures were true. Unfortunately, the creators of Superman (aka mild-mannered newspaper reporter Clark Kent) did not enjoy the fruits of their hard work.

Inexperienced and naive, they had both signed away their rights to the royalties and were only paid salaries for their efforts, which generated tens of millions of dollars in profits for DC Comics not only from comic books, but also from newspaper comic strips, animated cartoons, movie serials, feature films, long-running radio and television series and a host of merchandising spinoffs.

Not only did they lose their lawsuit in 1948 for creator royalties, but because they had launched the action, the powerful DC outfit had the team blackballed in the comics industry.

As a result, the two suffered almost three decades of poverty and frustration that took a tremendous toll on both men, seriously damaging their health.

In the mid-1970s, DC Comics was sold and the new owners decided the time was long overdue to make amends to Shuster and Siegel.

The new owners negotiated a settlement with the pair, granting both generous lifetime pensions.

It's a shame that Shuster, who illustrated Clark Kent partly on his own perceptions of himself as a 90-pound weakling, isn't alive to enjoy Canada's philatelic salute to his creative efforts.

Talking turkey with a big bird

Recipes

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Good morning class. Welcome to Turkey 101. I will be your instructor Ms. Cran Berry and this is my assistant, Mr. Gray Vee. Today we will be learning the dos and dont's of how to prepare and serve your holiday bird.

The turkey is our friend. When trying to figure out just how much of our friend you'll need to feed the assortment of guests you'll be entertaining, estimate approximately ½ to ¾ lb. of precooked weight per person.

To thaw your frozen turkey, leave it in the refrigerator for two to four days, depending on it's size. If you need it sooner than that and its packaging is airtight, place it under cold water until the bird is malleable. Rinse inside and out and pat dry.

Now it's time to bake your bird. Place the turkey, breast side up, on a rack in a shallow pan. Grease the entire breast and legs of the turkey with either oil or margarine, season with favorite seasonings.

Don't cover pan or add water. Totally covering a turkey while cooking prevents the skin from crisping up. Cover the turkey loosely with foil (like a tent), then press the foil tightly at ends of drumsticks and neck so they won't cook faster than the rest of the turkey. Don't let the foil touch the top or sides of the bird. Cook at about 325 and baste occasionally with a fat (margarine or oil) or marinade if you prefer.

COOKING TIME CHART

8 to 12 lbs, 3 to 3½ hours
12 to 16 lbs, 3½ to 4½ hours
16 to 20 lbs, 4½ to 5½ hours
20 to 24 lbs, 5½ to 6½ hours

The internal temperature of the turkey (when done) should be no less than 185. A pop up indicator is just as good as a meat thermometer. Stick the meat thermometer into the thickest part of the thigh. Check the turkey for doneness approximately 30 minutes before you think it will be done (according to the chart) by moving the drumsticks up and down. If it gives easily or breaks it's done.

I don't like to stuff turkeys (I bake the stuffing separately), but, if you do, NEVER stuff it ahead of time. Stuff it just before you cook it. Bacteria grows quickly and spoils a gathering like food poisoning. When the turkey is done, allow it to sit or "rest" for 20 to 30 minutes before carving. Don't forget to remove stuffing as soon as possible.

Remove turkey from roasting pan and pour drippings (fat and meat juices) into a measuring cup. Return 3 tbsp. of fat and 3 tbsp. of flour to the roasting pan, blend thoroughly. Place the roasting pan on a burner and heat slowly over low heat until the fat and flour are browned. Add water or broth to meat juices to make 2 cups. Add the liquid to the fat and flour. Cook, stirring constantly, until the gravy is smooth and thick. Simmer about 5 minutes and serve.

WHISKY BAKED APPLES

8 Rome Beauty, Cortland or Jonathan apples
½ cup chopped walnuts or pecans
½ cup dark or light raisins
¼ tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1 cup sugar
1 cup whiskey
1 cup water
2 tbsp. margarine
pinch of salt

Preheat oven to 350. Starting at the stem, peel the apple approximately half way down. Core each apple leaving about ½ inch at the base. Place the apples in a baking dish or pan. Stir together the nuts, raisins, cinnamon and brown sugar. Divide the mixture between the 8 apples and pack it into the cored sections. In a small saucepan mix together the remaining ingredients and heat over a medium flame, stirring until the sugars dissolve and the margarine melts. Simmer for 10 minutes. Pour the syrup over the apples. Bake, uncovered for 45 to 50 minutes, basting often, until the apples are tender but still holding their shapes. These can be prepared ahead of time and reheated at 325 until warm. Baste often during the reheating.

Chanukah Food

From mini to family size, love those latkes

Recipes

By NAOMI ARBIT
Special to The CJN

The best known — and most popular — Chanukah food is the latke. Now, the laborious hand grating of the potatoes can be speeded up by using a food processor.

MINIATURE LATKES

4 large potatoes
2 eggs, beaten
1 tsp. salt
1 Tbsp. flour
2 Tbsp. onion, grated
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. lemon juice

Cut potatoes in small pieces. Put all ingredients in a food processor and blend. Let sit for 15 minutes. Spoon liquid off top.

Drop mixture by teaspoonfuls onto hot, oiled skillet. Brown well on both sides.

To freeze: Place between sheets of aluminum foil on a cookie sheet. To serve, heat one layer of latkes at a time — on the aluminum foil sheet — in a 450-degree oven for 5 minutes.

Keep warm on a hot tray and serve with sour cream for dipping with a dab of kosher caviar.

Makes about 5 dozen.

PEAR CHUTNEY

2 cups sugar
1 cups kosher white vinegar
1 cup white wine or apple cider
2 oranges, diced with rind
1 lemon, diced with rind
1 lime, diced with rind
1 medium onion, diced
1 clove garlic, minced
1 cup white raisins
2 3/4 ozs. kosher crystallized ginger, diced
2 lbs. pears, unpeeled and diced

Bring sugar, vinegar and wine to a boil and simmer for 15 minutes. Add all remaining ingredients and simmer for 40 minutes.

Cool and then refrigerate in covered jars for as long as 6 to 8 weeks.

Makes more than 1 quart.

FAMILY LATKE

1 lbs. potatoes, peeled
3 Tbsp. vegetable oil (peanut)
6 Tbsp. butter
1 tsp. salt, divided; pepper to taste

Grate potatoes coarsely in a food processor and turn into ice water. Press out liquid well. In a 12-inch, non-stick skillet, heat oil and 3 tablespoons of butter. Add the potatoes. Press potatoes into a neat and even layer with a wooden spoon or metal spatula to completely fill bottom of skillet.

Brown over medium low heat for 15 to 20 minutes, then season with a bit of pepper and tsp. salt. Slip latke onto large plate; add remaining butter to pan and invert latke back into skillet to finish browning on other side — about 10 to 15 minutes more. Season with remaining salt and pepper.

Slip latke onto cutting board and slice into wedges. Using 2 large spatulas, transfer wedges to warm serving platter and sprinkle with chopped parsley.

Makes about 6 to 8 servings.

CRISP POTATO KUGEL

1 cup flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
pepper to taste
6 potatoes, peeled
2 eggs
1 large onion, chopped
1 cup vegetable oil

Stir together dry ingredients and set aside. Grate potatoes into ice water to prevent discoloring. Squeeze out all liquid; add eggs and mix well. Add dry ingredients. Saute onion in oil until golden; add to batter and mix well.

Pour into an oiled 15"x 10"x 1" jelly roll pan. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 30 minutes. Remove from oven and cut into squares. Return to oven and bake 30 minutes longer.

Serve hot with accompaniment of choice: apple sauce, yogurt, sour cream.

Judge slammed for remarks

MONTREAL — Jewish organizations expressed shock and anger late last week, when Quebec Superior Court Judge Jean Bienvenue of Trois-Rivières said that Jews did not suffer while being exterminated at Auschwitz and that women murderers "reach a level of baseness" that their male counterparts never do.

While B'nai Brith called for Bienvenue's dismissal, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) stopped short of that, but demanded that he retract the statements and apologize. At time of writing, Bienvenue had refused to do so.

CJC-Q also said it was scheduled to meet with Bienvenue and called on a judicial investigative body — the Canadian Judicial Council — to conduct an inquiry. Last weekend, the Quebec government also pressed for such an inquiry.

Bienvenue was sentencing convicted murderer Tracy Theberge for the grisly murder of her husband when he reportedly stated:

"At the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp in Poland, which I once visited with horror, even the Nazis didn't kill millions of Jews in pain or in blood.

"They died without suffering in the gas chambers."

B'nai Brith League for Human Rights chair Allen Adel, along with Rabbinical Council of Montreal president Rabbi Reuben Poupko, said Bienvenue should be dismissed for the comments.

"Individuals such as Ernst Zundel and James Keegstra and many others who deny or minimize the Holocaust have a field day with remarks like this, claiming vindication for their own message of hate," Adel said in a League statement.

CJC-Q chair Reisa Teitelbaum said in a statement that Bienvenue "displays a serious lack of sensitivity" in his remarks.

"To state that Jews who died in a Nazi concentration camp in Poland did not suffer demonstrates the judge's grave misunderstanding of the reality of the Holocaust," she said.

Both organizations also denounced his reference to women, with B'nai Brith vice-president Stephen Scheinberg calling them "ignorant and ridiculous," and CJC president Goldie Hershon calling it "unacceptable comment in a society whose foundation rests on extolling equality and tolerance."

'Peg pavilion returning

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After a one-year hiatus, Shalom Square will be rejoining Folklorama's family of ethnic pavilions again next summer.

Folklorama, Winnipeg's popular summer folk arts festival, will be in its 27th year next August. Last summer, for the first time in the festival's long history, the Israel pavilion did not open.

Longtime chair and co-chair Sharon Bronstone was unable to take on the responsibility again and no one else came forward to assume the major task.

Stuart Greenfield, Bronstone's former co-chair, had been willing to serve as co-chair again but could not do the work by himself.

Prospects for Shalom Square for 1996 looked grim after two meetings held this fall had drawn little interest. Finally, at a recent meeting, Mel Craven, Avram Charach and Marshall Miller volunteered to co-chair the pavilion.

"We decided that there was no way we would let Shalom Square be closed for another year," says Miller, a lawyer who served as artistic director of the Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble until last May. "We were all saddened last year that it didn't happen. A lot of people missed it."

Anne Scheiber dreamt of a better world for Jewish women and for all humanity.

She chose Yeshiva University to help realize this dream.

Anne Scheiber was a very special woman.

Born October 1, 1893, in Brooklyn, New York, Anne Scheiber had nine brothers and sisters. Her father died when she was a young girl, leaving her mother to support the family. After earning a high school diploma at night, while working days as a bookkeeper, Anne Scheiber worked her way through law school and found employment as a tax auditor. Despite superior performance reviews throughout her 23-year career, she was consistently passed over for promotion, which she attributed to being a Jew and a woman.

Anne Scheiber retired from government service in 1943 with a monthly pension of $83 and $5,000 in savings. Thereafter, she lived a simple life, alone, in a one-bedroom apartment in New York City. And she invested in the stock market.

Anne Scheiber died on January 9, 1995, at the age of 101, having accumulated a portfolio valued at $22 million. She left virtually all of it to Yeshiva University to support the education of Jewish women "who have indicated their desire to assist in the development of humanity and alleviate pain and suffering." The endowment will fund scholarships and interest-free loans at YU's Stern College for Women and Albert Einstein College of Medicine.

Anne Scheiber was indeed a very special woman. Thanks to her acumen, vision, and generosity, future generations of Jewish women will receive the education they will need to pursue their careers and serve society. We at Yeshiva University will be eternally grateful and bless her memory.

BBC honors Axworthy

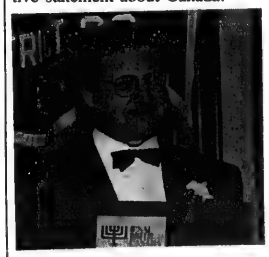
By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — B'nai Brith Canada recently bestowed its 1995 Award of Merit on Lloyd Axworthy, a man described by media mogul Izzie Asper as an icon in Winnipeg.

At the gala evening at the Westin Hotel attended by over 400 people, Axworthy, the member of Parliament for Winnipeg South Centre and federal minister of Human Resources, was noticeably touched by the award.

"This is the first time in public life that I have received this kind of honor," he said.

A product of Winnipeg's storied north end, the honoree praised the city in which he grew up and the people who make up the community. "I have had the tremendous good fortune to have been born in Canada into an incredible family and a community with enormous vitality," he said. "It is a long way from Mountain Avenue to the halls of Parliament in Ottawa. That the journey is not uncommon is a positive statement about Canada."



Lloyd Axworthy

Axworthy was first elected to Parliament in a 1977 byelection. During his years as a minister in the last Trudeau government, he was instrumental in the redevelopment of downtown Winnipeg.

In introducing the honoree, past honoree Pearl McGonigal, a former lieutenant-governor of Manitoba, recalled how, as External Affairs critic during the period just before the Gulf War, Axworthy travelled to Iraq with two other MPs and managed to return with three of the 17 Canadians who had been detained by the Iraqis.

Axworthy praised B'nai Brith and its League for Human Rights. "Theirs is often the first voice raised in a just cause. At no time in our history has B'nai Brith's voice been so desperately needed."

The honoree spoke of "a nagging sense of unease and anxiety" in society. He talked of the recent assassination of Yitzhak Rabin and how it has affected him.

"So many good people have been struck down for what they believe. Prime Minister Rabin stood for something. He stood out. The courage that he and others have shown stand in stark contrast to the image we in Canada have of politicians."

He spoke of his department's "tremendous" responsibilities, and hinted at the changes in unemployment insurance announced just days later.

CJN personal ad kindles couple's romance

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Late one evening about three years ago, Louis Verny, then a Metro Toronto police constable, was working on crowd control at a North York fire. Ilana Sherman, an employee of the Red Cross at the time, was also on the scene.

But it wasn't until last year, after Verny placed an ad in The CJN's Companions Wanted column, that the Toronto couple met and their romance was kindled.

Now planning a June wedding, they became engaged after a 10-month long-distance romance while Sherman completed a teaching degree in Durham, England.

Four transatlantic trips and $2,500 worth of phone bills later, Sherman, 27 and Verny, 29, are as delighted to be together again as they are with the way they met.

"Maybe we just got lucky, but I don't think so," said Sherman with a broad smile, her fingers intertwined with Verny's as they sat contentedly in her parents' North York living room. Pointing upward, she added, "I like to think we had a little help."

Intrigued by the ad Verny placed in May 1994 — "it kind of spoke to me" — she had saved it for over a month before replying. Because she was preparing to leave, she had no intention of becoming involved in a serious relationship.

Verny was surprised to receive her letter so late. He had already heard from 18 women and dated five of them, but concluded that he wasn't meant to meet his soulmate through an ad.

He liked the breezy tone of Sherman's letter, though, and called her shortly after receiving it.

The pair soon discovered they had more in common than the attributes Verny had mentioned in his ad. Aside from a shared passion for fitness and fun, both were becoming increasingly committed Jewishly.

"We clicked very quickly," said Verny. On their first date — July 21, 1994 — they went out for frozen yogourt and a long walk. "We just kept talking," Verny remembers.

The next day, Verny sent her a dozen roses, something he'd never done before.

They saw each other as often as possible, although Verny's work shifts sometimes made it difficult. (Combining police hours with an increasingly Shabbat-observant lifestyle was one of the reasons Verny left the force to go into business for himself, revitalizing Tri-Versa-Global, the silkscreening/promotional items business he had started in the 1980s.)

"We would meet for one hour here, 45 minutes there," said Sherman. Once Verny showed up for a 35-minute rendezvous at a park with chocolate truffles, milk and crystal champagne flutes.

"It was very romantic," sighed Sherman.

Even with her move to England, the young couple were in frequent contact, speaking several times a week and writing "tons and tons" of letters.

Every Sunday, Verny had dinner with the Sherman family, and would speak to Ilana on "sponsor time," often for the second or third time that day.

"Everyone we've told is pleasantly surprised that it worked," said Sherman, referring to the classified ad.

She and Verny would like to reduce the stigma attached to personal ads. They are proud of how they met and hope that their story will enourage others to give the ads a try.

Sherman felt a measure of comfort because the ad was in a Jewish paper. "Chances are, someone you know, knows them," she said. In her case, a friend was acquainted with Verny and vouched for him before they met.

Sherman advises others to "go for it" if they're considering using the ads, but to use the same caution they would with any blind date.

"We're a good example of it working. Neither of us was desperately looking. We've both dated. We've both been in serious relationships," she said.

"It's another option," added Verny. "We're living proof that it works."

Barrett gets pop star reception

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — In the chaotic world of British Columbia politics, it's hard to remember who is or has been the premier. We've had three in the past five years, with a new one coming up in February.

But when Dave Barrett, the province's only Jewish premier ever (from 1972 to 1975), appeared at a local book store to autograph copies of his biography, Barrett, A Passionate Political Life (Douglas & McIntyre, $27.95), he drew a big crowd.

Barrett's fans chatted with him and bought the book. People kept pointing, saying: "Look, there he is. Doesn't he look well! He's thinner and looks younger." An aging pop star couldn't have had a warmer reception.

The fans were mainly seniors who had benefited from Barrett's social reforms. He introduced Mincome, a supplement to the existing Old Age Security which gave seniors substantially more than what the feds were paying at the time. And he introduced a cooperative housing program.

During the Barrett regime, his NDP government passed a record 367 bills. He points proudly to the fact that most of his legislation has endured under succeeding governments.

The product of a Socialist-Communist family, he says, "I have enjoyed the access to power that only the British parliamentary system and a few other democracies can provide. But the political system is full of twists and turns and it requires participation by informed citizens. Without that we will end up marching to the beat of the corporate drum."

Barrett admits he's biased "and that is what drove me into politics. My bias was formed in the crucible of debate that began in the 1940s around social issues like national health care, improved education and housing. My bias tells me the right-wing forces that permeate Parliament are going to have to be challenged," he says.

Part of the coming struggle, he says, will be for a social charter with teeth inside NAFTA to protect the segments of the population that have been "savaged" by the deal. An assignment he is doing for the University of Western Washington, calls for proposals to bring NAFTA together with the North American Federation of Trade Unions in a tri-country structure to better the working and social conditions for men and women inside the NAFTA bloc.

Barrett's book deals mainly with B.C. politics during the Social Credit rule and the rise and fall of his own regime. At no time does he hide that he's Jewish — the first chapter is called Son of a Jewish Fruit Pedlar.

Born in Vancouver in 1930, Barrett was like most Depression kids — "We were poor but so was everybody else" — and he took whatever jobs were available:

He attended a small Jesuit university in Seattle and got a degree in sociology. He went on to a Catholic university in St. Louis for a degree in social work and won a $2,500 scholarship. The university president told him he was "the first Jew to get money out of Catholics."

Barrett's involvement in social work got him into politics, and he was elected to the B.C. Legislature, eventually becoming leader of the provincial NDP and defeating W.A.C. Bennett, who was the Social Credit premier for 20 years.

Barrett says he's been told he tried to do too much too fast. He lost the next two elections and stepped down as party leader in 1984.

He got back into politics in 1989 to fight the Free Trade Act in the federal parliament and won a seat in the Victoria area. In the 1993 federal election, he lost his seat.

Now 65, he says he still intends to do what he can to prevent the "right wing" from "killing" Canada's social programs.

Media backtrack on Canadian's links to Amir

CJN Staff and News Services

TORONTO — Sensational reports that a mystery Canadian bankrolled the defence of Yitzhak Rabin's confessed assassin, Yigal Amir, were deflated last weekend with descriptions of the man — a former Toronto dentist — as a "lost soul" with a vivid imagination.

Even the normally robust Israeli media — which named the man and described him as one of the richest Jews in Canada — backed down from the story, conceding that the rumors were not supported by facts.

Israel's largest daily, Yediot Aharanot, said fundraising efforts in Toronto are faltering, and quoted unnamed sources as saying no one has contributed to the man's efforts.

Friends and family of the man have told Toronto media that the story is a figment of his imagination.

"He is not a well man," his wife was quoted as saying.

Quoting sources in Toronto's Jewish community, another Toronto media outlet reported that the man, an ultra-Orthodox Jew, could not afford to underwrite Amir's defence.

Said a family friend: "This story about him is ridiculous. He made some comments to someone who works for TV and that is how the story got started."

Israeli media named the man and splashed the story on TV screens and front pages in what many described as an overblown feeding frenzy. Almost no Canadian media outlets named him and few in Toronto's organized Jewish community had heard of him before.

Earlier in the week, reporters braved subzero temperatures by parking themselves outside what was thought to be the man's upper-middle class North York home.

But neighbors say the former dentist visits only periodically and hasn't lived at the address for some time.

There was no answer at the home when a CJN reporter visited, and messages to his home and office were not returned.

Neighbors, who described the family as "nice," said the house went on the market under a power of sale a few years ago, but the man's family helped him hold onto it.

Israeli TV reported that the man has been using the home as a base for his fundraising, and that he has transfered money to the Amir family.

But friends and family say the man left his dental practice and went into real estate, including the partial purchase of a Jerusalem hotel. But he reportedly lost everything when the Canadian market crashed in the late 1980s.

"The individual represents no one and we are surprised that any credibility is being ascribed to these fanciful claims," Manuel Prutschi, director of the Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, told The CJN.

"It is hard to conceive of anyone associating themselves with such an endeavor."

There was no confirmation of whether the man's son served in the same army unit as Amir, or whether the son went to yeshivah with the assassin.

A report in last Sunday's Toronto Sun said the man tried to hire a lawyer in Israel a week after Rabin's murder.

But Tel Aviv lawyer David Heimovitz reportedly turned the man down, saying he did not have the time to get involved in the case.

Heimovitz said the Toronto man claimed to have been authorized by Amir's parents to find a suitable lawyer after they rejected the counsel provided by the state.

Civilian subdued Rabin assassin

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The brother of Menahem Damti, Yitzhak Rabin's driver the night he was murdered, told the commission investigating the assassination that he had been standing right behind Rabin and jumped on confessed killer Yigal Amir immediately after he shot the prime minister.

Naftali Damti and his other brother, Haim, had received clearance as special guests of the Prime Minister's Office and were sitting on the VIP podium, where both Rabin and Shimon Peres stood during the Nov. 4 peace rally in Tel Aviv.

Both told the Shamgar Commission last Sunday they saw Peres descend the podium's stairs first, but waited for Rabin to go down. They accompanied the prime minister as he walked to his car, where their brother Menahem was waiting behind the wheel.

"I was standing behind Rabin when I heard three shots. I turned around, saw the man with the gun and jumped on him, pulling him to the ground," said Naftali Damti.

Police officers who testified last week also said that the first man to jump on Amir was a civilian.

Israeli yeshivah head apologizes for remarks advocating violence

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Nachum Rabinovitch, the yeshivah head who advocated violence against Israel soldiers who evacuate settlers, has apologized for his comments.

The former Toronto rabbi, who now heads the Birkat Moshe yeshivah in Ma'ale Adumim, issued an apology last week in a letter to other yeshivah directors.

Two weeks ago, a tape was made public in which Rabbi Rabinovitch condoned the use of explosives against IDF soldiers who follow orders to evacuate settlements, calling such soldiers "evil." The comment was made in a private, secretly-taped conversation with an official of the religious peace movement Oz VeShalom. Rabbi Rabinovitch subsequently denied the charge, calling it a lie.

However, last week the rabbi — who headed North York's Clanton Park synagogue before moving to Israel in 1971 — wrote in a letter to colleagues: "It is possible that, out of pain, some very harsh expressions slipped out of my mouth, expressions which are misleading and which stand in contradiction to the views that I publicized and taught in the past and continue to uphold. For this I am sorry."

He added that he has always emphasized that along with his commitment "to opposing the mistaken and dangerous policy of the government, it is forbidden to be dragged into physical violence of any kind against anyone."

Rabbi Rabinovitch was one of several rabbis investigated by police recently for allegedly providing religious justification for the murder of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. No charges have been filed against him.

He is one of nine rabbis who issued a ruling in July forbidding soldiers to evacuate army bases or settlements in the West Bank.

The institution he heads is a hesder yeshivah, in which young men combine religious studies with military service. Parents of students at Rabbi Rabinovitch's yeshivah rallied around him, publishing paid advertisements in his support.

Prominent members of the national religious camp also backed him at a meeting last week. Rabbi Chaim Druckman, head of the Or Etzion yeshivah, said he was sorry Rabbi Rabinovitch "had said things that he did not mean in the heat of an argument" and called the claims against him "baseless."

Rabbi Nahum Rabinovitch

When the controversial tape was played for Rabbi Druckman privately over six months ago, he dismissed Rabbi Rabinovitch as a "marginal" figure whose comments should not be cause for concern, according to the secretary-general of Oz VeShalom, Yitzhak Frankenthal, who made the recording and brought it to Rabbi Druckman's attention. Frankenthal made the tape public last month after Rabbi Rabinovitch repeatedly claimed that he was opposed to violence.

Who is Jew status quo advocated

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency's executive called on the government last Thursday to refrain from introducing legislation that would change the status quo on religion.

Meeting with Diaspora leaders, the executive said it "views with the utmost importance the preservation of the unity of the Jewish people and the principle of pluralism."

It called on the government to "refrain from amending legislation or passing new legislation which would redefine the subject of 'Who Is a Jew' in a way which may estrange major parts of the Jewish nation."

Agency chair Avraham Burg went so far as to say that such amendments would be considered "a declaration of war."

The executive specifically asked the government "not to allow any change in the Law of Return, which is one of the pillars of Jewish identity with the state of Israel."

Diaspora leaders, including those from Canada, had come to mark shloshim services for Yitzhak Rabin, but stayed behind to discuss the issue.

The background to the executive's statement is the High Court of Justice ruling last month which gave indirect legitimacy to Reform and Conservative conversion in Israel.

Israel, U.S.A. & the World

'Silent majority' rallies

Although the rally was called to show Jewish unity and promote healing in the wake of the assassination, its planning became a lightning rod for all the community's divisions.

Critics of the peace process demanded the inclusion of speakers from the Israeli government opposition to show that Jews are not monolithic about the way peace should be achieved.

Organizers, for their part, maintained the rally was nonpolitical and to prove it, eliminated any references to "the peace process" in advertisements for the event. Instead, the organizers billed the rally as a show of support for "the pursuit of peace."

The change infuriated advocates of the peace process.

For fear of violating the Orthodox ban on hearing a woman's voice, organizers also reportedly turned down an offer made by Barbra Streisand to sing at the rally.

Despite the concessions, a few organizations boycotted the event.

Nevertheless, Leah Rabin urged unity. "Nothing could be more important" in this time of Jewish "crisis," she said.

"We do not want to forget who killed and who was killed."

Recalling the climate of violence and hostility among opponents of her husband in the months leading up to his death, she said, "The voice of the silent majority was not heard."

The turning point, she said, was the Nov. 4 peace rally where he was killed.

"The State of Israel is crying, the world is crying, but friends, beyond all the tears, I see he bequested peace, he bequested solidarity, he bequested Jewish unity," she said.

Gore waxed emotional when he addressed each Rabin family member by name and said that Americans "have been and are attempting to lift you up and say to you, 'We respect you and we love you.' "

Noting the approach of Chanukah, he said, "The ancient light of the Maccabees will guide the house of Israel [toward] light over darkness, faith over cynicism, reason over arms."

Gore issued a resounding call to follow Rabin's pursuit of peace, while warning, "The road to peace is not an easy one."

The obstacles of evil, hate, pain and division will slow the fulfilment of Rabin's legacy, he said.

But "we will not be daunted," he declared, to thunderous applause. "We will not be afraid."

Last Friday, the New York Times ran a full-page ad by the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA) and the National Council of Young Israel, which protested the event as partisan.

"How can I accept this as a rally of unity and reconciliation when both sides are not represented" in the program? asked ZOA president Morton Klein.

But the public show of discord angered people such as Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

"It's distressing and disturbing that after we've gone through the tragedy, we're unable to come together if only for the sake of memory and unity," he said. "Everybody's still playing their games and trying to make a point."

What might be possible if we could only talk to each other

We've just seen what happens when Jews forget how to talk. You know the value of discussion in communication, problem solving, community building and study.

What we, the Orthodox Union are asking of you is that you take advantage of a program to expand dialogue within your own congregation & community, right now.

Together, we can build consensus, and harmony. Together we can learn.

One Thousand Homes of Dialogue

Over the weekend of Shabbos Chanukah, from Friday, Dec. 22, to Monday, Dec. 25, we are launching One Thousand Homes of Dialogue. Jews all over North America will come together to learn how to resolve their differences. It could mark the beginning of a new way to talk.

We ask that you request volunteer hosts from your synagogue, from your friends, from whatever forum you have at your disposal, to offer their homes as sponsors of small "Chavurah"-style get-togethers. The Orthodox Union will provide you with resources for enlightening and powerful conversations that are designed to produce ongoing sessions of dialogue and study.

As a people we are in pain. The first step in the healing process is for all of us to learn how to talk and listen to each other.

One Thousand Homes of Dialogue is the first step.*

Call 1-800-4CHAVER, today to offer to become a host for a Home Dialogue, or to learn more about this important program.

We know that words can have significant impact. It's time for all of us to put them to better use!

One Thousand Homes of Dialogue

The course of study for the first night of dialogue will be exploring the role of men's obligations to his fellow man, stressing the Torah origins and significance of laws governing conduct between individuals.

Assad holds the key to comprehensive peace settlement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Hafez al-Assad looms over Syria like a monolith. The Syrian president, who recently marked the 25th anniversary of his seizure of power, is now the longest-ruling leader Syria has had since acquiring independence in 1946.

Only Muammar Kadafi, who has dominated Libya since 1969, has been in office longer.

Assad, 67, deposed his predecessor, Salad Jadid, in a coup d'etat in November 1970. Coups were a regular occurrence in Syria's formative years, but under Assad, the country has been fairly quiescent. He has imposed on Syria a brand of stability that exists only in a dictatorship.

Officially, Syria is a parliamentary democracy. But in reality, it is rigidly controlled by two formidable institutions — the armed forces, from which Assad springs, and the Ba'ath party, which has governed the country since 1963 and whose principal slogans are Arab unity, socialism and freedom.

A member of the minority Alawite sect which comprises 12 per cent of Syria's population, Assad was an air force general and the minister of defence before overthrowing Jadid, whom he imprisoned until his death last year.

Assad's longevity is a measure of his wily political skills, which are admired by friend and foe. By appointing Sunni Arabs to innumerable positions of importance in the regime, Assad has placated the majority Sunnis and thus maintained a firm grip.

But there have been periods of turbulence and uncertainty. In 1981, a coup attempt by senior air force officers was crushed. A year later, the army ruthlessly put down an Islamic fundamentalist rebellion in Hama, levelling neighborhoods and killing upwards of 10,000 dissidents.

Assad's brother, Rifaat, tried to wrest the presidency from him while he was recovering from a heart ailment in 1984. But the insurrection quickly fizzled and Rifaat was sent packing into temporary exile in Europe.

Several years ago, Assad began to groom one of his sons, Basil, as his successor. But since Basil's untimely death in an automobile accident nearly a year ago, Assad has turned to his other son, Bashar, an ophthalmologist, who seems to have no stomach for politics.

Assad is a fervent Arab nationalist whose title to the leadership of the fragmented Arab world has been vigorously challenged by competing claims from Egypt and Iraq.

Nevertheless, Syria — which has fought Israel in four wars and in numerous skirmishes — holds the key to the attainment of a comprehensive peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Without Syria's stamp of approval, Israel has virtually no chance of forging a rapprochement with countries like Lebanon (a Syrian protectorate for all intents and purposes) or Saudi Arabia (which is extremely cautious).

But to Assad's chagrin, Egypt, the PLO and Jordan have broken ranks with Syria and signed bilateral peace treaties with Israel, while Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Qatar have shown signs of embarking on a similar path.

Having failed to thwart the desultory movement toward regional peace, and having grown strategically weaker since the dissolution of the Soviet Union, Syria had no alternative but to negotiate with Israel.

Talks with Israel stalled

The talks, which began in October 1991 and turn on the future of the Golan Heights, have produced no real breakthroughs and are mired in seemingly irreconcilable differences.

However, Syria's participation in the peace process has not been an exercise in futility. Assad has acknowledged the strategic value of peace, and in a gesture of goodwill connected with the ongoing though stalled negotiations, he granted Syrian Jews permission to emigrate. Given the restrictions under which they lived, most Jews were only too happy to leave.

Syria's relationship with the sole remaining superpower, the United States, has invariably been imperfect. But in recent years, Assad has assiduously improved ties with Washington, first by joining the anti-Iraqi coalition during the Gulf War and then by agreeing to take part in the peace process.

Yet, much to Assad's irritation, Syria is still on a U.S. black list of nations sponsoring terrorism. Assad tolerates the presence of Palestinian rejectionist groups in Damascus. He has provided a haven to Islamic Jihad, perhaps the most radical Palestinian organization. He actively supports Hezbollah attacks against the Israeli army in southern Lebanon. And lest we forget, his security services tried to plant a bomb aboard an El Al plane in London in 1986.

Assad, a visceral anti-Zionist, is Israel's shrewdest and militarily strongest adversary. But he is also a pragmatist, and therein may lie the seeds of a mutually advantageous accommodation between Syria and Israel.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 4

• At a ceremony in honor of Yitzhak Rabin, Prime Minister Shimon Peres stated that there will be no compromises on Jerusalem. "We have never thought of Jerusalem as an issue of compromise for division or for partnership between two opinions."

Dec. 5

• An IDF commander was forced to leave the Tomb of Joseph after dozens of students from the Tomb of Joseph Yeshivah surrounded and harrassed him, calling him "traitor and murderer." Samaria Regional Council chair Aryeh Ofri criticized the students and promised to prevent the recurrence of similar incidents.

Dec. 6

• Redeployment of IDF forces is scheduled to be completed from Nablus by Dec. 14, from Kalkilya by Dec. 17, and from Bethlehem by Dec.18. Meanwhile, two IDF soldiers were wounded, one seriously, in a shooting incident north of Nablus.

Dec. 7

• Kol Yisrael reported that Israeli citizens will be permitted to travel to Yemen. In two months, the first group of Israelis will set out for Yemen by way of Jordan.

• Yediot Aharanot reported that Israel's credit rating has been raised from Triple B to A- by Standard and Poor Corporation.

• Prime Minister Peres met with Hosni Mubarak in Cairo to discuss joint economic plans in the fields of transportation, agriculture and tourism. At their meeting, Peres promised that he would appoint a major general in the IDF reserves to investigate the alleged murder of Egyptian PoWs.

Dec. 8

• Yediot Aharanot reported that Prime Minister Peres sent a letter to U.S. President Bill Clinton, asking him to grant clemency to Jonathan Pollard.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• A special exhibit on the legend of Khatam Sulayman (King Solomon's Seal) at the Tower of David Museum examines the contribution of Islam to western arts and sciences as displayed through this symbol.

• The International Symphony Orchestra, consisting of 100 young musicians from all over the world, will gather in Jerusalem until Jan.10 for Classical Winter in Jerusalem, a special program of learning and concerts.

IDF pulls out of Tulkarm

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops last Sunday withdrew from Tulkarm, the second West Bank town to be transferred to Palestinian control under the terms of an agreement signed in September for expanding West Bank autonomy.

The withdrawal came despite a spate of recent violence in the West Bank that has heightened security concerns for settlers living in the region.

Shortly after midnight Sunday, Israel Defence Force troops lowered the Israeli flag outside the former army headquarters in Tulkarm, as control was transferred to an advance guard of Palestinian police officers.

The town was decorated with Palestinian flags and with photographs of PLO leader Yasser Arafat, in celebration of the Palestinian officers' arrival.

Israel completed its withdrawal from the West Bank town of Jenin in mid-November.

Under the terms of the September accords, known as the Interim Agreement, Israel is scheduled to withdraw from four more West Bank population centres — Kalkilya, Nablus, Ramallah and Bethlehem — by the end of December.

In March, the Palestinians are scheduled to assume control over major portions of Hebron, the only West Bank town where settlers live alongside Palestinians.

The redeployment from Tulkarm took place within hours of a drive-by shooting near the West Bank settlement of Neveh Daniel that wounded a settler and his 4-year-old daughter.

Yonatan Moshitz, from the West Bank settlement of Efrat, was listed in moderate condition after undergoing surgery on his legs.

His daughter was released from the hospital after being treated for glass splinters.

Two other daughters in the car were reportedly not injured in the Saturday night attack.

Residents of the Gush Etzion settlement bloc in the West Bank issued warnings that settlers would face additional security problems in the wake of an Israeli redeployment from the region.

Earlier this month, four Israeli soldiers were wounded in two shooting incidents in the West Bank.

Last Friday, Israeli soldiers shot and killed a 23-year-old Palestinian during demonstrations in Nablus.

Meanwhile, Israel eased restrictions on Palestinian workers from the West Bank, granting an additional 6,800 permits allowing the laborers to enter Israel.

In Hebron, where some 400 Jewish settlers live among 100,000 Palestinians, a group of 15 Palestinian police arrived Sunday to open up the district coordination office that will serve the area.

Fifty settlers reportedly blocked the road outside the district office to protest the arrival of the police.

Another group of settlers reportedly blocked the main road between Hebron and Bethlehem to protest the Saturday night shooting of the settler and his daughter.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres reaffirmed Israel's commitment to the peace process during a meeting last Friday with Arafat at the Erez Crossing separating the Gaza Strip from Israel.

It was Peres' first meeting with Arafat since becoming prime minister.

Filmmaker attracted to Net Worth's underdog story

Players dropped the gloves with NHL owners

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To think that until a few years ago, regional divisions in the National Hockey League were named after Conn Smythe, Jack Adams and James Norris.

Legendary figures in their day perhaps, but today seen more as tinpot dictators with feet of clay than mythical builders of the sport.

Perhaps NHL deep-thinkers had an inkling that the current crop of sports reporters and filmmakers were not inclined to treat these bygone heroes with the reverence of an earlier generation when they decided to adopt more generic nomenclature like the Atlantic, Pacific and Central Divisions.

Just in the nick of time too, as the publication of Net Worth, a scathing expose of the NHL in its dark days of union-busting, has left a bad taste among those who've studied the history of the NHL.

In recent weeks, those legendary figures have suffered another body blow with the airing of Net Worth, a Bernard Zukerman production for CBC Television.

Based on a chapter of the book of the same name, Net Worth explores the players' attempt in 1956 to form an association and later a full-fledged union. A compelling film with excellent performances throughout (Al Waxman as Adams is particularly effective), Net Worth pulls no punches when describing the underhanded way owners and management fought to keep the players in a state of virtual servitude.

Al Waxman (left) should be named first star for his performance as Red Wings G.M. Jack Adams. Waxman is seen here with Aidan Devine, who played Ted Lindsay, the hockey great who fought to organize a players' association in the NHL in 1956.

Although it's hard to believe that one side could be so bereft of redeeming characteristics, Zukerman believes the black and white depiction of the protaganists is justified.

"[The players] were totally underpaid and lied to as to how much was being made [by the owners]," he said. "Today it's a totally different situation. They're making much more money. They have a union. Those guys couldn't see their own contract or know how much was in the pension."

Zukerman, a 10-year veteran of film production, said the chapter on Red Wing great Ted Lindsay and his attempts at forming a union jumped out at him when he read Net Worth.

"I thought it was a terrific story and would make a wonderful movie. It was about an underdog who took on the big machine," he said.

The story took on Canadian myths about former NHL commissioner Clarence Campbell, Smythe and others and left them appearing rather disreputable.

Smythe's anti-Semitic feelings (he's shown ranting at the players' Jewish lawyer Milton Mound) "was relatively well known. It didn't surprise people of a certain generation," Zukerman said.

While the owners came across badly, the depiction of the players is a rather mixed bag. Lindsay, who served as a consultant to the filmmakers, came across as a hero and natural leader as he attempted to mobilizing the players to stand up to the browbeating owners and managers.

The treatment of Gordie Howe, Mr. Hockey, who just wants to get on and play the game, is a different story.

"We certainly didn't intend to portray him as the villain of the piece. He was young and unsophisticated. He was clearly manipulated by Jack Adams," Zukerman said.

While nitpickers on sports talk shows have criticized the movie for failing to be 100 per cent faithful to the facts (some poetic licence must be allowed), Zukerman dismisses critiques about the depiction of Busher Jackson, the former Leaf great from the fabled "Kid Line."

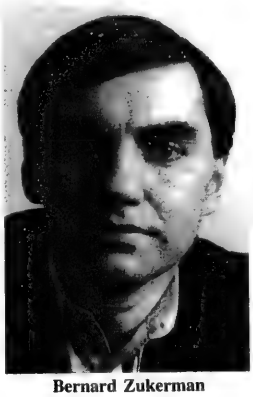
In the mid-50s, Jackson "clearly sold sticks outside Maple Leaf Gardens that Conn Smythe sold to him and that's how he made his living," Zukerman said.

Although Montreal Hall-of-Fame defenceman Doug Harvey did not die in a railroad boxcar, as the film suggests, at one point he lived in one. At the end of his life, the Habs did take care of him, Zukerman acknowledged.

And the Larry Suharchuk character, who was shown as destitute, living in a car and dying there in a fire, was "a composite figure" based on a number of players, Zukerman said.

Still and all, Net Worth has garnered plenty of positive reviews, and deservedly so. Its appeal goes far beyond Canadians and hockey-lovers to present a story with universal appeal

"It's being sold around the world right now," Zukerman said. Negotiations are under way with networks in England, France and Scandinavia and it will eventually be transferred to cassette for home viewing.



Bernard Zukerman

For Zukerman, Net Worth is only the latest success in a string of award-winning productions. A graduate of Osgoode Hall Law School, Zukerman went on to producing and directing documentaries beginning with And Then You Die in 1986, an examination of drug dealing. It won five Gemini Awards and numerous international prizes.

His 1987 film, Skate, won the Gemini for best Canadian TV movie while other Zukerman productions include The Squamish Five, Love and Hate: The Story of Colin and JoAnn Thatcher, (winner of five Geminis), Conspiracy of Silence, Dieppe and Million Dollar Babies.

JERUSALEM MARATHON

This year's marathon was reported to be one of the worst organized ever. Many participants complained of poor directions and poor police traffic control, which at times brought the runners into direct conflict with irate motorists. It has always been a source of complaint that cities like Jerusalem and Tel Aviv are brought to a virtual standstill during a work day to allow the marathon to take place. Due in part to the difficulty of the Jerusalem route, this year's marathon was 21.1 kilometre event, in effect, a half-marathon. Asaf Bimro, Israel's half-marathon champion, won the race in one hour, nine minutes and 44 seconds. [Isranet photo]

Marathon mom hits pavement

Jerusalem Dateline

JERUSALEM — To escape the pressures of raising a family and running a business, Liora Leibowitz has always enjoyed jogging. But it never occurred to her, even though she could run comfortably for an hour or more, that she was marathon championship material in the making.

Participating in her first marathon earlier this year at the age of 35, Leibowitz was the first woman across the finish line. She finished the Tiberias Marathon, around the Sea of Galilee, in 2 hours, 51 minutes and 36 seconds.

The mother of three, who lives near Tel Aviv, sees it as a "realistic dream" to represent Israel in the Atlanta Olympic Games in 1996.

"I could kick myself for not realizing I was marathon material when I was younger," said Leibowitz, who is Israel's aerobics champion and who runs her own aerobics studio.

"At my age it's too late to accomplish anything more than modest achievements."

Leibowitz is, nevertheless, determined to make the most of her talent. At her first official competition last year, a 10-km race, she astounded judges and spectators alike by finishing first, beating all the male and female runners in a time of 40.02 minutes.

Leibowitz thinks she can lower her best time in the marathon to a respectable 2 hours 45 minutes. She is less confident she can reach the Olympic qualifying time of 2 hours 35 minutes.

"Still, a year ago I didn't even dream I would be one of Israel's leading marathon runners. So I guess anything's possible," she said.

Patinkin in splendid voice as he charms audience

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the moment Mandy Patinkin appeared on stage, smiling and nodding approval as the audience sang Canada's national anthem, he had an almost palpable rapport with some 3,200 people who had come to hear him sing.

An engaging performer, Patinkin, 43, has a splendid and much touted voice. But it was his stage persona — equal parts funny man, heartthrob and regular guy — that seemed to transform the cavernous O'Keefe Centre (his only Canadian stop this tour) into a cozy venue when he appeared there Dec. 2.

Working on an unadorned stage, ladders and other paraphernalia visible behind him, Patinkin appeared more rumpled than his television alter ego, Dr. Jeffrey Geiger of Chicago Hope, whose portrayal won him an Emmy earlier this year.

Dressed in a short-sleeved black t-shirt, loose-fitting black pants and grey Nikes, Patinkin was unshaven for an upcoming television taping.

"Let me tell you guys what you missed," he called to latecomers at the Saturday night concert. And he did. In detail.

"First of all everybody came in. Everybody was chatting. It was kind of nice. And then the house lights went down and ... I blew the words, then I found them again. Then you got here, so you haven't missed a thing."

His fast-paced recap, followed by thunderous applause, was immensely charming. Shtick aside, when Patinkin blew the words to the melodious Jitterbug Waltz later in the show, the audience was only too happy to hear his repeated attempts to complete the old Fats Waller tune.

Patinkin learned to sing as a youngster in a Chicago synagogue choir, where he would imitate the cantor to perfect his own skills.

In an encore that stretched his Toronto concert to almost two intermission-free hours, he included Yossel, Yossel, a Yiddish number that built to a frenzy, and the lament (but with its chorus in Yiddish) from Evita, his Broadway breakthrough for which he won a 1980 Tony award when he starred as Che.

"What do you want from me? I'm Jewish," he shrugged.

Patinkin's eclectic repertoire of romantic, whimsical, rousing and message-bearing songs — among them Harry Chapin's Taxi, Cohen Owes Me $97 (Irving Berlin), Beat out dat Rhythm on a Drum (Georges Bizet/Oscar Hammerstein II), and Children Will Listen (Stephen Sondheim) — was matched by his vocal range, which runs the gamut from theatre-filling bass baritone to sweetly poignant falsetto.

Accompanied only by his expert pianist, Paul Ford, Patinkin performed with skill and intensity, often leaning back in his chair and closing his eyes as he sang.

I preferred to keep my eyes open and savor every aspect of the concert.

Skilled workforce fuels boom

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israel is becoming one of the world's fastest growing economies due, in part, to its educated, innovative and stable workforce, says the consul and trade commissioner of the Israel Economic Mission.

"Israel's workforce is distinguished by advanced technical skills and efficient work methods, at a manpower cost lower than in the United States or Europe," Yael Varsano-Barzilay told a recent board meeting of the economic development committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

She said medical, scientific, agricultural and advanced technological research and development facilities that rank among the world's finest, plus a wide range of "exceptional government incentives geared for high technology research and development make doing business in Israel very attractive."

Varsano-Barzilay added that Israel is "the only country in the world having free trade agreements with the European Community, the European Free Trade Association and the United States. Presently, Israel and Canada are negotiating a free trade agreement which both governments hope to ratify soon."

She said the Government of Israel Economic Mission, with a mandate to develop commercial ties between Canada and Israel, "is always available with an extensive database, in order to provide the timely information necessary to conduct business with Israel easily and advantageously.

"The mission can assist prospective investors to do such things as set up joint research and development ventures, establish manufacturing facilities or subsidiaries and furnish government and industry contacts when visiting Israel.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

AGO Receives Tanenbaum Gift: Joseph Rotman, president of the Art Gallery of Ontario's board of trustees, announced last week that Joey and Toby Tanenbaum have given 16 European Old Master paintings from their internationally renowned collection to the Art Gallery of Ontario.

The Tanenbaum gift includes outstanding examples of French, Italian, Spanish, Flemish and Dutch pictures dating from the late 15th to the early 18th century. Among them are canvases by such masters as Giordano, Ribera, Coypel and Jouvenet. It is the largest gift of European Old Masters ever received by the AGO, and one of the most generous gifts of art ever made in Canada.

"Toby and I are delighted to be able to make this gift to the Art Gallery of Ontario, which we both love, and to know that these works will be seen and enjoyed by the many visitors who come through its doors," said Joey Tanenbaum.

The Tanenbaums have been major supporters of the AGO for a long time. Less than three years ago, they pledged $3 million to launch an endowment campaign for the AGO, and Tanenbaum's mother, Anne, donated $1 million for a capital fundraising campaign. The beaux-arts core of the building, together with the Max and Anne Tanenbaum Gallery and the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Atrium, are now collectively known as the Tanenbaum Centre of European Art.

"Joey and Toby Tanenbaum's generosity to the Art Gallery of Ontario sets a shining example to philanthropists everywhere," said the AGO's chief curator Matthew Teitelbaum."

Candles Long Ago: Since Chanukah is almost upon us, it seems like an appropriate time to note that the American-based Parents' Choice Foundation has honored Sharon, Lois & Bram's Chanukah album Candles Long Ago with a gold award for outstanding children's audio recording.

Candles Long Ago is a mini-album of songs for the Chanukah season, featuring traditional favorites such as Dreydl, Dreydl Oy Chanukah and I'm a Little Latke. The title track was written for the trio by composer Glen Roven and Emmy-winning writer Mark Saltzman. Alive with the images of Chanukahs long passed, the new song has captured the hearts of Jewish audiences.

Sharon, Lois & Bram are currently in the midst of a 37-city Canadian tour based on their new album, Let's Dance!

Songs & Candles: Du Maurier Arts Ltd. presents Songs and Candles, a special Chanukah concert performed by the vocal group Trio Panache (Lilac Cana, Ruth Piitz, Benjamin Stein). The concert is part of the series Music for A Sunday Afternoon at the Koffler Centre. Admission $5. Dec. 17, 3 p.m. Leah Posluns Theatre, Bathurst Jewish Centre, North York. 416-636-1880, ext. 299.

Kosher Lamb Chops: WNED-TV (Channel 17 in the Toronto area) is airing a children's program for Chanukah. Lamb Chop's Chanukah, featuring Shari Lewis, Lamb Chop and friends, and guests Alan Thicke, Pat Morita and Lloyd Bochner, in a celebration of holiday traditions, foods, songs and stories. It airs Dec. 18 at 8 p.m. and repeats Dec. 19 at noon.

On radio, WNED-FM (94.5) offers The Chanukah Story, as told by the Western Wind vocal ensemble with narration by Theodore Bikel, Dec. 17 at 5 p.m. Adventures in Good Music, Dec. 18 at 11 a.m., features a Festival of Light in which Karl Haas celebrates Chanukah.

Night of a thousand plaids

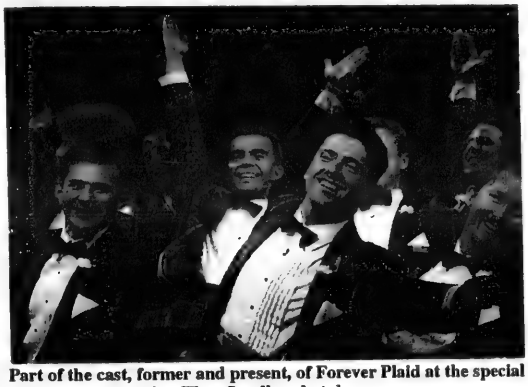
By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The creator of the hit musical Forever Plaid said he always felt like an outsider growing up in the '50s in a small American town with very few Jews.

"I had to explain Chanukah in front of the whole school," Stuart Ross said in an interview. "The whole thing [idea of the show] comes from my Jewishness. It was part of my longing to fit in.

"This experience is the subtext of Forever Plaid, which is about four outsiders — the '50s-good-guys types. They looked good on Father Knows Best, but the truth is these guys got beat up," he said.

Ross was in Toronto to direct Night of a Thousand Plaids, a benefit in support of Equity Fights AIDS, marking the 1,000th performance of the Toronto production of Forever Plaid, which has been running since March 1993.



Part of the cast, former and present, of Forever Plaid at the special 1,000th show reunion.[Tom Sandler photo]

There are only four people in the cast of Forever Plaid. But there were 30 in Night of a Thousand Plaids. Former and current cast members of Canadian productions came together for the benefit, which was also a tribute to the show's musical orchestrator James Raitt, who died of AIDS in 1994.

Forever Plaid has been performed across the United States, in Tokyo, Calgary and Vancouver. It's a hit in Toronto and the Canadian tour is booked through 1997.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

The upcoming Quebec Winter Carnival is a prolonged touristic smorgasbord of wholesome outdoor family fun in Quebec City, the historic St. Lawrence port that is the capital of the province. Highlights include the formal Queen's Ball at the Chateau Frontenac Hotel, a costumed Mardi Gras ball, and two nocturnal parades with many colorfully lit floats.

As in previous years, the carnival will also feature ice sculpting and hockey competitions, a snow-bathing ritual, a snow slide, a torchlit ski run and a gruelling canoe race across the frigid St. Lawrence to Levis, Que. The theme of this year's carnival is The Magic of Winter and hopefully, there will be lots of snow.

Organizers say Quebec's frosty shindig is the largest winter carnival in the world and the third largest carnival anywhere, after those in Rio and New Orleans. It is expected to attract more than one million participants, including many tens of thousands from Montreal and points outside the province, and to generate an estimated $27 million for the local economy.

An architectural jewel, Quebec City is North America's only walled city north of Mexico. Dominated by the Citadel fortress and the Chateau Frontenac that towers above it, the narrow winding streets of the upper and lower towns are characterized by ancient stone houses, churches and cosy squares. Resembling a fine European cityscape, the old part of town has been declared a UNESCO world heritage site.

Loire chateau

A majestic setting and a resemblance to a Loire Valley chateau have long made the 103-year-old Chateau Frontenac the emblem and signature of the city. The 612-room auberge is offering carnival rates range of $125 to $185 per night for a single or double room, with a special rate of $94 per night based on a stay of three consecutive nights.

Ice sculptors from about 30 countries are expected to shape the ice sculptures that will adorn city streets. The Ice Castle, scene of the coronation as well as the opening and closing ceremonies, takes about a month to build. Last year's castle was about 50 metres long and 15 metres high, and utilized some 13,000 blocks of ice.

A 42-year-old tradition, the carnival runs Jan. 26 to Feb. 11. The parades are Feb. 3 and 10. For more information, call the Info Carnaval Line, 1-800-621-5501.

Bed & Breakfasts: Generally less expensive than hotels, bed and breakfast establishments (B&Bs) are not only for travellers on a budget. Instead, they are for travellers of every means who seek an alternative to a shoe-box hotel room.

As two recently published guidebooks make plain, a bed and breakfast establishment can offer at least as much color and character as a typical chain hotel, if not much more. A bed and breakfast inn can be a fisherman's cottage in Nova Scotia where guests can watch whales and the tides, or a chalet in a British Columbia forest with a panoramic view of the ocean and the mountains.

At 408 pages, the latest edition of The Canadian Bed & Breakfast Guide, by Gerda Pantel (Penguin Books, $19.99) is an encyclopedic reference to more than 1,200 B&Bs from coast to coast, including even the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

As Pantel points out, there are many unique B&Bs across Canada. Travellers may rent rooms in a typical Canadian farm and help with the chores, or in a replica windmill, a Maritime lighthouse, a native home on an Indian Reserve.

Each page of this pleasing guidebook shows at least three B&Bs. A postage-stamp-sized photograph is accompanied by information about rates, location, facilities, restrictions on children or pets and other details.

Even if you're planning a B&B holiday within Ontario only, you'll find Pantel's book useful, since it provides capsule descriptions of almost 400 establishments throughout the province. Readers who prefer a few more words of description, however, may choose to consult The Best Places to Bed & Breakfast in Ontario: A Selective Guide, by Janette Higgins (Juno/Firefly, $17.95).

This book is not quite 200 pages in length and features almost 100 B&Bs. Each two-page spread is devoted to a single establishment, with text on one side and an illustration on the other. The extended treatment allows Higgins to indulge in colorful prose and to offer useful suggestions.

Higgins advises guests to notify hosts of a change in planned arrival time, to respect private areas of the home and to remember that although you are paying for the privilege, you are still a welcome guest in someone's home.

Real Estate is booming in PHOENIX, ARIZONA. It is the 2nd fastest growing area in the U.S. With the growth of major industries, the influx of high tech professionals from California and the purchase of the Winnipeg Jets, property value is beginning to climb. Interest rates are at an all-time low. If you would like to invest, I have a beautiful office bldg., built in 1990 with a CAP \0.6%; 2 of 3 tenants are from the Fortune 500. - $2,000,000 U.S.

A new distribution/warehouse in an excellent Commercial Park, 9.2% CAP, 3 multi-million $ tenants - $3,715,000 U.S.

A new Shopping Centre, just opened in an excellent developing community, 100% leased with major food chain as anchor, 9 stores & offices with 4 future pads - $6,875,000 U.S.

The properties will be worth "twice" their value in a short time as rate of increase is 13-20% annually and still climbing. Phoenix area continues to grow and is the 6th largest city in the U.S., and if you want to move here or buy a winter home, the temperature is 77°.
4 Bdrm house 1800 sq. ft. + pool - about $120,000 U.S.

Dear Ella,

One of my closest friends is a talented, beautiful but very obese woman. Since the birth of her child, she has gained even more weight. At a recent social gathering, her mother took me aside to convey her displeasure with her daughter for her size, her eating habits, and apparent lack of self respect.

My friend's mother believes her daughter will listen to me so she implored me to have a talk with her to convince her to seek professional help for her weight problem.

I have been a friend to this woman for many years and I've always promised myself to accept her for who she is. I felt very uncomfortable about her mother's cruel behavior but I'm also concerned about my friend's weight problem. Should I tell my friend about this, and perhaps exert some supportive pressure on her to deal with her obesity?

Too Big For Me

Dear Too Big For Me,

Your friend's mother is being just that, a mother. She can't help worrying about her daughter and feels she must find any way or anyone that can get through to her daughter.

You on the other hand are her friend, a very different connection than that of a mother. You seem to care very much about your friend. I'm sure she knows that she is overweight and chances are she struggles with it in her own mind.

Instead of pointing out the obvious, be there for her in a different way. Go out for long walks, invite her for dinner and prepare a low-fat menu, be supportive and encouraging at every small step she takes. Help her get over her roadblocks and feel good about herself and above all listen and be there for her.

To quote from this month's Prevention magazine "The secret of success is not to give a push but to grease the path."

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Chanukah

Children playing with their dreidels.
Mamma's chicken soup with kneidels.
Chanukah's a happy time.

Doting parents story-telling.
Bubbie, zayde ever-kvelling.
Chanukah's a family time.

Triumphant are the Maccabees.
Pass me one more latke, please.
Chanukah's a festive time.

Candlelighting. The menorah.
Eight days light! Keineinhora!
Chanukah's a glorious time.

Healthy, happy we should be.
Zei gezunt ... you and me.
Chanukah's a hopeful time.

Michael S. Bernstein

A Child's Request

Zayde sweetheart, my cuddly zayde
Tell me a Chanukah tale from long ago
When the Jewish people had their Temple
And their strong men could deliver a mighty blow.

Tell me of their ways, successes
From the time when David was their king
When they took on most powerful warriors
And laid them low with armor's ring.

Tell me again, how we succeeded
When other nations waned and fell
When their wicked leaders knew but hatred
And would gladly see us burn in hell.

To repay you - I'll study Torah
All the books of Moses - five
And carry on our old traditions
And keep the Jewish flame alive.

John Podlog

Chanukah

With shaky hands I watch my zayde light the colored candles.
He sings the brachas
in a loud voice.
Sing with me he says,
sing.

My bubbie watches from the kitchen.
I can smell the latkes frying.
She holds the plate out to me.
Eat she says,
eat.

On the window sill
the candle flames dance.
Their glow is warm and bright.
Be happy they say to all,
be happy.

Rachel Danzinger, 10 years old

Even at so tender an age, 2-year-old Hayden Cantor bears aloft one of the many precious symbols of our faith and tradition. Happy Chanukah.

Chanukah, The Festival of Lights

Chanukah, the Festival of Lights
Eight candles burned, for eight long nights.
The Temple was destroyed, the Maccabees were annoyed,
When soldiers came, they played a dreidel game.

They studied the Torah, and lit the menorah.
The army was small, but they fought them all.
They attacked the army, one by one,
Until the Temple (Beit Hamikdash) was won.

They believed in God and got their way,
That's why we celebrate this holiday!

We eat latkes made from potato.
And we play a wonderful game named dreidel.
We light the candles one to eight.
I think Chanukah is really great!

In the fridge we keep the gelt,
For fear that it possibly will melt.
The shammash is the lighter of them all,
It's usually large and quite tall.

Soon it will be Kislev 25
And then Chanukah will arrive.
Antiochus was the Greek boss,
And it was their side that had the loss.

This poem is based on the eternal light.
Let it burn for days and nights.
Nes Gadol Haya Sham
We thank the Maccabees for the freedom they won!

Alex Consky and Adam Samosh, 10 years old

A Chanukah Poem

I watch my spinning dreidel,
It glides across the floor,
And as it spins, it pulls my thoughts,
To days of long before.

In my mind, I see men of faith,
Standing, firm and straight and proud,
Saying, "Our land is holy, our land is pure,
Idol-worshipping is not allowed!"

I see these men unite and fight,
They are powered by determination,
They must evict the pagan Greeks,
And restore the Jewish nation.

I see priestly heroes by the Temple menorah,
Tears of joy make their eyes bright,
For the tiny bit of oil found a week before,
Burns miraculously for its eighth night.

But abruptly, my thoughts vanish,
As my nose sniffs the air,
Bubbie's latkes are calling out to me,
Ignore them? I don't dare!

Moishe Kupfer, 15 years old

Chanukah

A light
A flame
Illuminates the darkness all around
It is the second night of Chanukah
In the concentration camp.
A young boy, twelve years of age sits at his makeshift menorah.
He risked his life
to obtain potato peels for the cups.
The oil is margarine saved from previous rations.
The wicks - they are threads from his thin, worn garb.
As he sits and stares, hot salty tears roll down his pale, haggard face.
he is alone, with the spark of fire
in his soul,
with the spark of life
In his soul.

In the typical Jewish family, nowadays,
Chanukah is truly a joyous affair.
The sterling silver menorah,
enveloped in dancing lights, -
The aroma of chanukah foods,
permeates the home and spirit.
Golden coins and dollar bills
spill freely into children's outstretched hands.
The endless games of dreidel serve to remind us of the days of old.

Still, we must not forget
The people of those bygone days.
They risked their lives to be able to create ... lights.
Lights to illuminate the darkness
All around, all around
Lights to end this long stretch of night and bring the Mashiach, now!

Devorah Leah Lison, 13 years old

LIGHT IN TOTAL DARKNESS

Chanukah in the Nazi transit camp at Westerbork, Holland in 1942. Unfortunately, most of the people seen in this photo did not survive the nightmare that awaited them. [Jewish Liturgy, Keter Publishing House, Jerusalem, 1975]

Valuing the light of faith

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

If there is one holiday full of exciting stories it's Chanukah. I mean, here you have an old (even then) civilization struggling to keep its own ways against a larger, stronger, occupying power.

You have the priest, Mattathias, killing a collaborator, then raising his sword and gathering his five sons and followers around him with the thrilling words "Whoever is on the side of G-d follow me!"

Using guerilla tactics, the small band of nationalist fighters overcome the conquerors and recapture Jerusalem.

What kid doesn't pretend that he (or she) is a Maccabee? What kid isn't positive that he (or she) would have joined the Maccabees and done wondrous deeds too, if only they had lived back then?

Then there is the story of the beauteous Judith, who plies the Syrian commander with wine and then kills him in order to save her city.

What's not to get excited about?

Even the way we celebrate Chanukah is terrific. We eat food that is made with oil, especially latkes and sufganiot, telling ourselves, no doubt, that we are only enjoying such unhealthy stuff because of religious devotion.

Family parties, presents for the kids, Chanukah plays and pageants at school, the menorah shining into the street — what's not to like?

The thing is, that the focus of Chanukah is not really the battles and the military victories. The important part of the story — and this we often overlook in the glamor of the Maccabees' fight — is the miracle in the Temple.

The Maccabees were not fighting merely to regain their national pride. Their goal was to regain the Temple, the centre of their religious existence.

The miracle was not that they killed enough Syrian Greeks to toss them out of Judaea. The true miracle was that the tiny cruse of oil, the remnant of the purity that once infused the holy Temple, burned for eight days.

And that the battle-weary soldiers, who reached the Temple Mount dirty, and tired, and probably a little overcome with unaccustomed glory, recognized the importance of maintaining that purity.

It's so much easier to concentrate on the excitement and the food and the presents and all the hoopla.

If there was any time when we, as Jews, should stop and think about what is truly important, it surely is now.

We have had a lesson in what happens when fanatics believe that violence is the way to solve problems. When people on both sides of an issue use harsh and insulting words to hurt and drive away, instead of words of loving-kindness to bring reconciliation.

In my family, we each light a menorah, and treasure the experience of watching the table burst into greater and greater majesty with each day.

Each year I tell myself that I will not cry (but I always do) at the incredibly moving sight of my daughters and my husband gathered close together, joined for these moments not only as a family, but as part of the chain of Jewish tradition that values the light of faith over the darkness of ignorance, and quiet peace over the wild exaltation of war.

This year I will stress to them — as we should all stress to our families more than ever — the significance of the words of the prophet Zechariah: "Not by armies and not by might but by my spirit, says HaShem, the Master of Legions"

From all of us at the The CJN, a joyous, and, especially, a peaceful, Chanukah.

Chanukah Greetings

Light as the symbol of hope, trust and salvation

By Rabbi Mark Dratch

"And God said, 'Let there be light!' " and so began a process which forged order out of a world of chaos and evolved harmony from a reality of discord. And since that first moment of creation, light has symbolized hope and trust and salvation.

"The Lord is my light and my salvation, of whom shall I be afraid?" (Psalms 27:1); "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path" (119:105); "Unto the upright He shineth as a light in darkness" (112:7); and "Though I sit in darkness, the Lord is a light unto me" (Micah 7:8). No wonder light and fire continuously burn in so central a place in our minds and souls. In them, we find warmth for our bones that chatter from the chills of alienation and depression. In them, we find enlightenment to brighten the dark shadows of fear and ignorance. And in the flames that rise eternally heavenward, denying the pull of gravity and defying the shackles that would chain them to a somber reality, we find the inspiration to dream of a brighter tomorrow.

This was God's gift to Adam and Eve when, in banishing them from the Garden of Eden in the darkness of the first motza'ei Shabbat (Saturday night), He gave them the gift of fire (Bereshit Rabbah 11:2-3). This was more than just a means to light their way. This torch was also meant to spare them from the lament of John Milton's Samson Agonistes, "O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,/ Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse/ without all hope of day!"

This torch was a divine expression of comfort and a message of hope for Adam and Eve. It was a constant reminder that they can find light despite the darkness, and that, like the flames of that torch that burn upward, they also can climb out of the abyss of their exile and one day return to the elevated plains of Paradise.

God gave another gift of light: "Ki ner mitzvah veTorah or," For the commandment is a lamp and the Torah is light" (Proverbs 6:23). Through Torah, God's word illuminates the proper path of moral and spiritual living. Through Torah, God's fire purges and purifies our souls. Through Torah, we, like the poet, can proclaim, "I saw Eternity the other night,/ Like a great ring of pure and endless light." (Henry Vaughan, The World)

Fire and light are central to many of our religious practices. The menorah, a seven-branched candelabrum, burned daily in the Temple in Jerusalem, and is today symbolized by the ner tamid, the eternal light, that burns over the holy arks in all synagogues. Candles are lit to welcome the Sabbath and holy days, and a candle is lit during the havdalah ritual which marks the end of Shabbat. Candles are lit during the eight days of Chanukah. Some brides and grooms are escorted to the chupah by candle-bearing parents. And memorial candles are lit during shivah in houses of mourning and to commemorate yahrzeits, the anniversaries of the deaths of loved ones.

These candles bring to light different ideas. The ner tamid reminds us of God's continuous presence. The golden glow of the Shabbat candles creates an atmosphere of shalom bayit, of peaceful and harmonious relationships between members of a household who, by the light of these candles, can see each other, talk with each other and share with each other. The Shabbat candles are meant to be used. They are lit in the rooms where we eat and the places where we live in order to enhance our enjoyment of the Sabbath. We light them not only for ourselves, but "a candle for one serves also as a candle for a hundred" (Shabbat 122a), in order to enable us to share the warmth of Shabbat with others.

The Chanukah lights are different. We are not permitted to derive any benefit from them at all. They are not meant to transmit the warm, personal and intimate mysteries of Shabbat, but rather to proclaim the intellectual, historical and spiritual principles of unfailing Providence, uncompromising faith, and unlimited self-sacrifice. Each night we increase the number of candles we light so that we end this eight-day holiday in a blaze of light and a crescendo of commitment to the pristine principles for which the Maccabees fought.

Memorial candles are lit to symbolize the eternal human soul, which refuses to be held down by the physical body in which she is housed during a person's life and which refuses to be imprisoned in the earth to which that body returns. The soul, like the flame, reaches eternally heavenward. The flame is also a prayer for comfort in the face of the darkness of the shadows of death. It is a hope beyond all hopes that life does not end with the grave and that there is a physical existence beyond the biological reality. The flame defies the mockers who, in the words of William Blake, say, "tis all in vain," and "throw the sand against the wind ... The atoms of Democritus/ And Newton's particles of light/ Are sands upon the Red Sea shore/ Where Israel's tents do shine so bright:" (The Scoffers).

Perhaps it is for all these reasons and others, that candles, thousands

Chanukah Greetings

Chanukah Fun

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

Welcome to CJNews for Children. Night comes earlier every day and it is cold outside, but the good news is you know by these changes that Chanukah is coming. In December, in which the Hebrew month of Kislev falls, the holiday begins. Your menorah shines brightly, you eat doughnuts and latkes and you and your family play the dreidel game.

What to do!

How many ways can you think of to make a menorah? With help from an adult you can try decorating clay flower pots, egg cups from an egg carton, thimbles glued to a box covered in tin foil, gum drop candles with a hole in the centre glued onto a stained wooden base, spools of thread on a base and even glass test tubes. Good luck!

If you are interested in crafts, cooking or traditional stories here are some great books to read.

LETTERS TO LINDA

Dear Linda,
My name is Leeyat and I live in Bat Chen, Israel, outside Netanya. Our town has orchards with oranges, tangerines, avocados and pomegranates. Close to my school are farms with cows and chickens.
During Chanukah I like to eat doughnuts (sufganiot) that are cooked in oil to remember the miracle of Chanukah. I eat potato latkes too. My family lights the chanukiah and we put it on our window sill. Some use candles and we use oil. We sing lots of songs. In most of the towns a huge chanukiah is lit on top of a building or water tower so everyone can see it. I always play with dreidels (sevivonim) that have the words Nes Gadol Haya Po which mean a big miracle happened here. I like chocolate money and presents. Isn't Chanukah the best holiday?

Leeyat Amar, age 8

Dear Linda,
I'm a regular reader of your column. You asked us to tell our stories about what we do for other people. So I decided to write in about my experience volunteering this summer at the North York Food Bank. At the food bank my family and I sorted and packed food in boxes and sealed the boxes. I learned about helping others from this experience. I was surprised that besides the paid workers, we were the only people at the food bank. So I urge all of you out there to go and help a worthy cause, and learn a thing or two while you're at it.

Sincerely,
Josh Goodbaum, age 12

What's it all About?

The first candle goes in the far right of your menorah. Add one candle each night from the right of your menorah to the left. Light it from the left to the right.
Baruch ata haShem Elokaynu Melech haOlam asher kidishanu bimitzvotav vitzivanu lihadlik ner shel Chanukah.
Thank you G-d for making us holy through your commandments and telling us to light the Chanukah candles.
Baruch ata haShem Elokaynu Melech haOlam she asa nisim l'avotainu bayamin hahem bazman hazeh.
Thank you G-d for making miracles happen a long time ago for our ancestors and today.
On the first day you say:
Baruch ata haShem Elokaynu Melech haOlam shehecheyanu vikiymanu vihigiyanu lazman hazeh.
Thank you G-d for bringing us to this day and enabling us to celebrate this holiday.

Now you light the menorah with the shammash or helper candle.

Once your menorah is lit, the glow of the candles and the voices of your family singing Maoz Tzur, (Rock of Ages) is magical. You find yourself back in the village of Modin in Judea over 2,000 years ago. The ruler is Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria. He has told the Jewish people to take Greek names, to dress like Greeks and worst of all, to worship Zeus and the other Greek gods. You and your family say 'No' to Antiochus and his soldiers. He makes animal sacrifices to his many gods in the holy Temple in Jerusalem.

A leader in your village named Mattathias kills a Jewish man who is giving sacrifices to the Greek gods. Mattiatias and his family flee to the hills. They gather Jewish farmers and others and together they fight for freedom. They are brave and strong in their beliefs and they defeat not just one but four Syrian armies. After three years, Mattathias' son Judah Maccabee and his helpers capture Jerusalem. It is the 25th day of Kislev in 165 or 164 BCE and the Jewish people celebrate the first Chanukah. They clean the Temple and rededicate it to the G-d of Israel. There is only one jug of the pure oil left, enough to burn for one day. The oil burns for eight days. What a miracle!

You hear the voices of your cousins playing the dreidel. When you join them, you smile to yourself because you know how amazing this holiday really is.

Let us remember a modern day hero, Yitzhak Rabin. He was a warrior for the Jewish

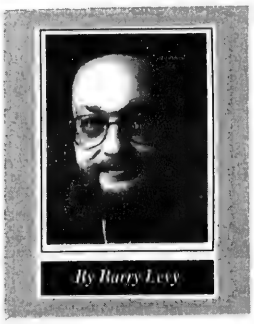
The chanukiah



By Barry Levy

Contrary to popular opinion, the six-pointed star of David bears no demonstrable relationship to that king and holds no significance as a biblical symbol. In fact, many ancient inscriptions, tombs and works of art demonstrate convincingly that the universally used Jewish symbol was a lamp, sometimes a single-wick clay lamp, sometimes a multi-branched metal lampstand, the most famous of which was the seven-branched oil-burning variety commonly referred to in Hebrew as a menorah.

Lampstands with seven lights or branches appear in ancient Egyptian art and almost everywhere Jews lived. In fact, the number of exemplars is so extensive that one is hard-pressed to decide which of their qualities to add to the many biblical and post-biblical textual descriptions, in order to reconstruct how menorot actually looked.

While the seven-branched menorah is carefully described in the Torah, the origins of the chanukiah, the eight-part Chanukah lamp, are less certain. Pesikta Rabbati, a Palestinian midrash, associated the Chanukah lights with an apparently spontaneous torch parade held in the Temple during its rededication.

The better known Talmudic account relates them to a miracle during which one jug containing a single day's supply of oil burned for eight days, presumably in the seven-branched golden candelabrum used daily in the Temple, though why this valuable artifact would have remained after the desecration is unclear.

Ancient accounts are silent about the eight- or nine-branched menorot used today.

The Talmud provides numerous opinions about how the Chanukah lights (oil, not wax candles) can be kindled. One requires a single light each day for the entire family. Others suggest kindling from one to eight lights, with the House of Shammai opting for decrease from eight on the first day to one on the last, and the House of Hillel for our practice of a daily increase from one light to eight.

These two positions are considered as especially pious — many people, it would seem, lit only one light per day or one each day for each member of the family — but neither requires an eight-armed candelabrum. From one to eight single lamps could have been lined up as needed, and I remember from my youth a Chanukiah made of small metal chairs augmented each night to the appropriate number.

Early sources require no ninth light; the shamash, now a standard feature on chanukiot, apparently originated in medieval times.

Archeologists have recovered eight-sectioned lamps that seem to have served as chanukiot, most likely in talmudic and early post-talmudic times. Some clay models have separate holes for up to eight wicks, all of which drew from a common well of oil; others are block-like, with the upper surfaces hollowed into eight or more individual sections, each of which held a supply of oil and a wick and, where appropriate, perhaps extra materials.

The eight-sectioned Chanukah lamp thus seems to have originated in talmudic times, perhaps as early as the tannaitic houses of Shammai and Hillel, but whatever its origins, it has flourished in all Jewish societies. Elaborate artistic creations of precious stones and metals, simple boards with mounted bottle caps, and fragile clay holders of oil and wicks all testify to some two millennia of continued commitment to remembering and celebrating the ancient rededication of the Jerusalem Temple and its rituals and the freedom to practice them. (For an excellent and readily available collection of pictures, see the Encyclopedia Judaica, Vol. 7, s.v., Hanukah Lamp.)

and thousands of candles, were lit by thousands and thousands of Jews at Mount Herzl in Jerusalem and at Kikar Malchei Yisrael in Tel Aviv and throughout the world, in response to the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, zichrono livrachah. These candles were candles of remembrance. These candles were candles of hope and prayer. These candles were a rage against the darkness of the chillul HaShem, the desecration of all that is Godly and Jewish, that was brought about by his evil murderer.

The three shots fired at Rabin on that infamous motza'ei Shabbat brought about a new era, one that is marked by the cold and alienation and disorientation of the post-Edenic exile. How we so desperately need that Divine gift of light that was given to Adam and Eve on that first motza'ei Shabbat! Light that will illuminate our way. Light that will enlighten our minds and inform our attitudes. Light that will warm our feelings toward each other. And light that will forge order out of chaos and evolve harmony out of discord.

"Let there be light!"

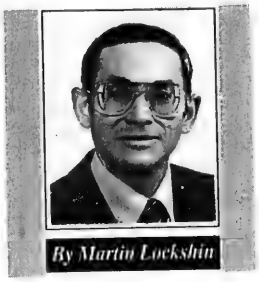
Involved with the world



By Martin Lockshin

We are living now in a difficult time, when the Jewish people is still trying to recover from the terrible shock of one Jew having killed another because of a dispute about Jewish nationalism and religion. It is interesting but sad to note that this is not the first period of our history when Jews have taken up arms against other Jews in Eretz Yisrael. It happened before, at this time of year, during the days when the story of Chanukah was unfolding.

We generally tell our children that Chanukah commemorates the war of the Maccabees against the "Greeks" or the Seleucids. Occasionally we more accurately say that the war was also against "Hellenizers." Rarely though do we openly tell our children that those "Hellenizers" were Jews, that 2,200 years ago two (or more) groups of Jews with different views about Judaism and its relationship to Western values were taking up arms against each other.

As the great historian Elias Bickerman once wrote, "The wrath of the Maccabees was poured over Jews, not heathens."

There are probably a number of good reasons why Jewish parents don't often tell their children all the facts about the Chanukah story. Americans today do not generally have raucous celebrations of the great military victories of the Civil War, when brothers killed brothers. So also, Jews are more comfortable remembering that some of our enemies then were non-Jews, instead of remembering the internecine tensions.

But even more than that, the "problem" of the Chanukah story is that, if the story is told in a straightforward manner, many modern Jews aren't really sure which side we should be rooting for!

One can, of course, portray the story as one of conflict between steadfast Jews (the Maccabees) and radical assimilationists. However, one could just as easily, if one were so inclined, portray the Maccabees as obscurantists who failed to recognize the beauty of the Greek world. The Maccabees' opponents could be seen as those who tried to get their Jewish values to conform with the "best" of Western culture and who were persecuted by old-fashioned Maccabees.

Personally speaking, I have to say that I too feel some confusion about the Chanukah story. As an observant Jew, I naturally identify with the Maccabees. However, when I lecture about humanities in the university, when I teach about Homer and Plato, I often ask myself what Judah Maccabee would think about my lifestyle.

But it would be simplistic to conclude that the moral of the Chanukah story is that Western culture does not blend well with Judaism. And in fact, the late great chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, offered a beautiful explanation of the nature of Chanukah.

Rabbi Kook quoted the well-known Jewish law that a chanukiah — Chanukah menorah — ideally should be lit outside of one's house. And, in fact, in some climates that are warmer than Canada's, such as in Israel, many pious Jews do light their chanukiyot outdoors, facing the market place, facing the public. But the code of Jewish law, the Shulchan Aruch, says that bishe'at ha-sakanah (in dangerous times), a chanukiyah is to be lit inside one's home. "One places it on one's table and that is sufficient."

Rabbi Kook explains that this law represents the essence of the message of Chanukah. There have been times in Jewish history, says Rabbi Kook, that the appropriate spot for the light of Judaism was inside our homes, and only inside our homes.

"At times when evil winds blow through the world, when there is wild irrational hatred for Jews ... then Jews should turn only to their own homes and to their own tables, to their own culture to Torah and its commandments."

Preserving and even hiding the light of Judaism within the walls of our homes is all that we can do then.

But Rabbi Kook continues, "When 'the time of danger' has passed, when Jews have returned to their land" and when the dangers of anti-Semitism are not as prevalent as they once were, the light of Judaism — and the light of Chanukah — belong outside, in the world at large.

Rabbi Kook adds that the natural function of the Jewish people is to be "a light to the nations," and that role is very difficult to play when one is forced to hide the light of Judaism far away from the world at large.

The message of Chanukah, according to Rabbi Kook, is that there have been periods when Judaism has survived best by closing itself off from the world. But even the main symbol of Chanukah, the chanukiyah, shows that Judaism is ideally located outside the home, involved with the world at large.

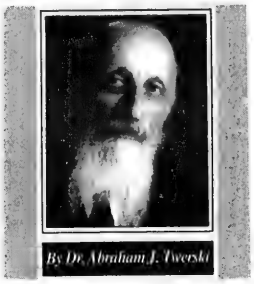
Chanukah Greetings

The benefit of lighting a candle



By Dr. Abraham J. Twerski

The importance of Chanukah can be grasped by the observation that the menorah has always been the prime symbol of Judaism. Long before the Hasmoneans, the eternal light of the menorah served as testimony to the Divine Presence among Israel.

Israel came into being at Sinai with the charge to be a spiritual nation. Just what is the spirituality that Israel was to teach all humanity?

To put it succinctly, the "spirit" is that component which separates man qualitatively from all other living creatures. In contrast to biological science, which classifies man as homo sapiens, a hominoid whose only distinguishing features is intellect, Torah defines man as a spiritual being. Except for man, all living things are biologically driven, compelled by their nature to seek gratification of their physical desires and incapable of exerting a will contrary to these desires.

Man alone is truly free, free to chose his behavior and to deny himself gratification of his drives when he feels these are morally and ethically inappropriate. Sapiens is not enough, because a person may be of great intellect, yet be indulgent, hedonistic and dedicated to self-gratification. According to Torah, this highly intellectual person is grossly deficient in his humanity. It is only when one achieves the dominance of spirit over body that one becomes fully human.

Indulgences and hedonism are based on self-centredness, on a concept that everything in the world should serve one's own needs. The light of Torah illuminates another path, as Hillel told the pagan who sought to convert, "The essence of Torah is 'love your neighbor as yourself.' All the rest is commentary."

It is not easy for man to overcome his physical-animal nature and cravings and subjugate them to the spirit. This can be facilitated if one realizes that one never stands alone, and that one's own happiness and destiny are related to and even contingent upon that of one's neighbor, and indeed, that of mankind as a whole.

The phenomenon of lighting a candle illustrates the interdependence of people. You may light a candle for your own benefit, but the light can be enjoyed by others as well. You may light a candle to illuminate the room for others, but you too benefit by its light. The light of a candle is the antithesis of detachment from others.

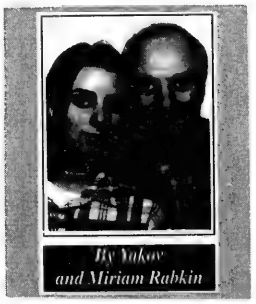
We do not celebrate the military victory of the small band of Macabeeans over the mighty armies of Antiochus. Rather, we celebrate the triumph of Torah over the hedonism of Hellenism, and it is for this reason that we light the Chanukah candles.

The Chanukah menorah is thus the symbol of spirituality, for only when one sets aside one's own desires as being secondary can one dedicate oneself to the brotherhood of mankind, to caring for others. And this spirituality cannot remain stagnant, but must constantly grow, hence the progressive increase of light from the first to the eighth night of Chanukah.

Chanukah commemorates the miracles of the menorah, and we can take its teaching to light our way to a miraculous achievement of a brotherhood of humanity.

Dr. Twerski is the medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Centre, outside Pittsburgh.

Creation's light



By Yakov and Miriam Rabkin

Several holidays originating in the Northern hemisphere at the end of the solar year relate to light. The winter solstice brings longer days and more light, and we are all aware of at least two holidays that celebrate light – Chanukah and Christmas.

According to the Pentateuch, light was created on the first day, even though sources of light were created on the fourth. This suggests that the light that existed before the creation of the sun and the moon was of a different kind.

The traditional Jewish mind distinguishes five kinds of light related to the five times the word "light" is found in the story of creation. According to the Midrash Raba, each symbolizes one book of the Pentateuch.

The first kind of light was used in the creation. The second one is the light of redemption as it reminds us of the story of Exodus, specifically one of the plagues, darkness, during which "all Israel had light in their homes" (Exodus 10:23). The third kind is the light of repentance, as it stands for the book of Leviticus, most of it devoted to sacrifices. A sacrifice accompanied by sincere repentance enables one to share in the Divine light. The fourth kind of light, related to the Book of Numbers which concentrates on the Tabernacle (mishkan), was the light that illuminated the way to the holy Temple of Jerusalem. Thus the fifth kind of light represents the commandments, since the biblical reference contains an apparent redundancy: "He called the light day."

Light in Judaism

But is this not the same? the midrash asks, and continues to associate this reference to light with Deuteronomy, i.e. the Second Law which reiterates most of the teachings of Moses.

It is quite clear from these references, just a small sample of traditional interpretations of light, that the Jewish tradition is interested in the meaning of light, its moral significance. Conversely, scientific studies of light are interested in the physical nature of light devoid of moral significance.

A comparison of light in science with light in Judaism offers a good opportunity to point out, perhaps, the most important distinction between the two. While the Jewish tradition looks for ways to improve human behavior, science explicitly avoids all discussion of the metaphysical meaning of physical phenomena. Science and Judaism thus find themselves on different planes which preclude either contradiction or mutual corroboration between the two. It would be as absurd to "prove" by genetic research that the Torah is right in claiming that humans descended from one and the same source, as it would be to "disprove" the story of creation through references to contemporary cosmology and astrophysics.

Fundamentalists, both Judaic and scientific, may find this approach unacceptable. They would try to "get at the real truth," and thus remain oblivious to the essentially asymptotic nature of our approximation of the truth, something that most serious Judaic scholars and serious scientists would concur with. However, those on the periphery of either Judaism or science (or of both of them, perhaps, the most grievous case) lack humility in realizing that our understanding of the Torah and of the physical world is by definition limited. One should strive to shed light on issues of Judaic or scientific nature. At the same time, one must remember that our understanding depends on the nature of the light we shed, which affects not only our understanding but the very object of our study. Since Werner Heisenberg formulated his Principle of Uncertainty, science finally came to share with Judaism an essential human characteristic.

Yakov Rabkin is a professor of the History of Science at the University of Montreal. Miriam Rabkin is in Grade 10 at the Hebrew Academy in Montreal.

Maccabees brought Jews back into fold

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

The Maccabees entered the stage of history when Judea was still ruled by priests of the line of Zadok, the high priest in the time of King David who claimed to be a direct descendant of Aaron. In addition to defeating the Syrian-Greek army, the Maccabees replaced the Zadokites as high priests and later became the monarchs of Judea. However the latter episodes are not part of the traditional story of Chanukah.

When they came under Greek rule, the Jews, who had been primarily agricultural, developed an urban class, began to produce intellectuals and became interested in secular pursuits. Some Jews wanted rational explanations for old rituals and myths, and they began to question the ability of the Zadokite priests to adapt the Torah to the times. For the first time in Jewish history, secular schools were started for the children of the new urban class, as an alternative to the Temple religious school. Here pupils could acquire skills for business and leisure pursuits.

When Mattathias started the rebellion in Modin, only a small number of Jews followed him. Except for the pietists, the Zadokites all collaborated with the Syrian Greeks. The Hasmoneans, who became the Maccabees under Judah, were described as "destitute, non-Zadokite Levites who aspired to priestly power." The priests, to resist Antiochus, joined the Maccabees, even though the latter were more nationalistic than religious.

Many Jews had become so assimilated that they cared nothing about religion or a distinctive Jewish identity. The Maccabees had to conduct "a fanatical vigilantist campaign," according to Theodor Gaster, to bring the Jews back into the fold and gain the strength for an open campaign against the Syrian-Greek power.

Many Jews cared nothing about religion

When the Maccabees and their followers began to do battle with the army of Antiochus, they did demonstrate heroic efforts, but their victory was not due solely to their own strength. Antiochus had other enemies at the same time and the Maccabees also turned for help to Rome, the new rising power.

Jerusalem was recaptured around 165 BCE and the Maccabees sought to rededicate the Temple; then the "miracle" of the oil is said to have occurred. But there are other versions of this story.

Thousands of years before the Maccabean era, primitives thought the sun was dying as the days grew shorter and the weather colder. The primitives tried to encourage the sun by lighting bonfires on the hilltops. When the sun began to come back, this led to the winter solstice festival.

It is said that the Maccabees recaptured Jerusalem and the Temple some weeks before Kislev, but Judah knew the winter solstice story; so he decided to delay the victory proclamation until Kislev 25, which approximates the date of the solstice.

The struggle of the Maccabees did not end with the rededication of the Temple however. Judah and his followers were driven out of Jerusalem a year later and three more years of military action followed. They won another great victory on Adar 13, 161 BCE, when they defeated General Nicanor and his army and captured Jerusalem for the second time. The Jews began to celebrate this victory as Nicanor Day, a festival that was later superseded by Purim. But the Maccabean struggle was still not over.

Struggle was still not over

A year later, Judah was killed in battle and was succeeded in turn by his brothers, Jonathan and Simon. In 152 BCE, Jonathan made peace with the Syrian Greeks and became the high priest, a post held by the Maccabees for the next 115 years. However, it was not until 141 BCE, when Simon succeeded Jonathan, that the Maccabees were able to expel the Greek garrison from Jerusalem.

Simon was succeeded by his son, John Hyrcanus, who had himself proclaimed king of Judea around 136 BCE. The Hasmoneans then ruled as monarchs for almost 70 years.

The Roman power put an end to Maccabbean rule in 63 BCE, and the Pharisees then became the dominant movement among the Jews. The rabbis who arose from the Pharisees did not remember the Maccabbees with any special kindness. This probably explains the decision not to include the books of the Maccabees in the Jewish holy scriptures, but to consign them to the Apocrypha. And "apocryphal" has come to mean works of questionable authenticity.

A peaceful habitation in Jerusalem

By MICHAEL GREENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Throughout This Year in Jerusalem Mordecai Richler praises the hospitality of Mishkenot Sha'ananim where he stayed while writing his book. Philip Roth confesses in Operation Shylock that he usually stays at Mishkenot Sha'ananim when he visits Israel. Perhaps the most detailed description of the place occurs in Saul Bellow's To Jerusalem and Back, written some 20 years ago.

Bellow describes the physical details of this writers' and artists' colony before moving on to the spiritual qualities of Jerusalem. "Double window shades don't keep out the morning light .... Shade flowers grow in the long corridor of Mishkenot Sha'ananim. The kitchen window opens on a small garden — hardly that: a terrarium with glass walls, open at the top. The flowers are exotic birds-of-paradise, too flamboyant for my taste."

Today, thick wooden shutters keep out the oppressive heat and light, while the gorgeous colors of the flowers against Jerusalem's desert stone can hardly be cause for complaint. Standing at the arched wooden door, the writer looks across Gai-Hinnom to Mount Zion and "feels that the light of Jerusalem has purifying powers and filters the blood and thoughts; I don't forbid myself the reflection that light may be the outer garment of God." Yet even the spirit may wilt in the 110 degrees of chamsin even as it recoils at the noise of traffic impatiently honking in the heat of the valley below. The road to gehenna is paved with good asphalt intentions and too many trucks disturbing the peace as modern history clashes with its biblical past around the Judean Desert.

Mishkenot Sha'ananim derives its name from Isaiah (32:18): "My people will abide in a peaceful habitation, in secure dwellings and in quiet resting places." Indeed, even amid Jerusalem's modern hum and buzz of construction, it is today an oasis of tranquilty. Built in 1860 by Sir Moses Montefiore as the first housing project outside the Old City walls, the centre was restored in 1973 by a gift from the Levitt Foundation as a retreat for writers, artists and musicians.

Descending the steps from the Montefiore Windmill, the visitor turns right and walks about 50 yards to enter the small lobby of this terraced colony. The intimate restaurant (Café Montefiore) opposite the entrance has been open to the public for the past year. On the lower level the walls are adorned with Erwin Schenkelbach's striking photographs of many of the luminaries such as Bellow, Herman Wouk and the Italian film-maker Lina Wertmuller, who have been guests at Mishkenot.

The entire structure, consisting of approximately 20 units, is about 300 yards long with front and back entrances to each unit. On either side of the front door (with its intriguing mezuzah of eye-level archaeology) are the smoked glass interior mini-gardens mentioned by Bellow. The vaulted ceilings of each apartment suite are about 20 feet in height and add to the stately atmosphere of the decor. A circular stone staircase leads to a comfortable loft. Outside the back door is one long open terrace where guests can meet during the evening when the cooler breezes beckon and where music from scheduled concerts from the Sultan's Pool below waft up through the larger gardens with their imposing cypresses.

During the particular week in May when we stayed there, we had an impressive array of neighbors. I had been reading an article in The Jerusalem Post about an international literary conference in Beersheva where Amos Oz was the host and Dame Iris Murdoch the guest speaker from England. In the tiny lobby of Mishkenot, there was Murdoch directly across from me, with her rather eccentric husband, the famous literary critic John Bayley. They were about to leave for a tour of the Dead Sea — energetic septuagenarians doing battle with the chamsin.

At the same time strains of classical violin music emanated from further down the celebrated corridor where two of the members of New York's Guarneri Quarter were practicing for the Israel Festival, echoing the earlier sounds of Isaac Stern.

Also in residence was Sir Peter Brook whose play The Man Who was being performed in Jerusalem, also part of the Israel Festival. Based on Oliver Sacks's The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat, a book about neurological disorders, Brook's play is a fascinating rendering by actors from different countries around the world. Brook held an enlightening news conference with his actors in the intimate

Chanukah Greetings

A memorable Chanukah

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Memories of a Chanukah party 51 years ago flooded the mind of Charles Appel, 75, of North York, when he heard the voice of Frieda Leider Stein.

Leider Stein, who was 7 years old at the time, had been hidden in a friend's house and told her parents were dead.

Appel, a leading aircraftman with the RCAF, and other Jewish Canadian servicemen had helped organize a Chanukah party for the Jews of Eindhoven, Holland, and among those present were Leider Stein, her parents Mozes and Klara Leider, a 14-year-old sister Hilde and baby sister Jetty. It was the Leiders' first simchah since the family had gone into hiding in separate places after the Nazis invaded.

Appel often visited the Leiders after that party, bringing them gifts of kosher food from Canada. The observant family had no meat during all the years they were in hiding.

Leider Stein tracked Appel down by inserting an ad in a Jewish veterans' magazine, acting on the advice of Canadian servicemen she met in 1994 at a commemmorative gathering in Eindhoven.

"We are planning to meet each other for the first time in 51 years next summer, when she visits Toronto with her husband," Appel said. The Steins live in Wilmette, Ill., a suburb of Chicago.

Appel moved on from Eindhoven with his unit into Germany, and in the displaced persons camp at Lunenburg, he met his future wife, Renee, a Holocaust survivor. The Appels have two children, Charlotte Tessis and Aubrey, and two grandchildren, all of Toronto.

Charles Appel and his future wife Renee in 1945, at the displaced persons camp in Lunenburg, Germany.

Unfortunately, Leider Stein's sister Hilde was killed in an air crash in California some years ago. This saddens Appel, he said, because he remembers her as a happy-go-lucky child who knew some English and translated for her parents who spoke Yiddish.

The Appels, who visit Israel every year, stopped at Eindhoven one year and revisited the scene of the party, little knowing that Leider Stein would one day track them down.

An inner sanctum of light library at the side of the lobby.

On the third day at breakfast I met Jean-Francois Lyotard, a well-known Parisian literary theorist of postmodernism. Lyotard was invited as the main speaker for a conference at the nearby Van Leer Institute on art and psychoanalysis.

The following evening we were sitting on the terrace listening to Israeli music from the Yom Yerushalayim concert when one of our neighbors approached us and offered us a drink. He introduced himself as David Baltimore, a microbiologist from MIT who was in Jerusalem for a conference on cancer and cell biology. The next day we learned that he had won the Nobel Prize.

When the creative Diaspora converges on Jerusalem, it finds its head and heart in the inner sanctum of Mishkenot Sha'ananim.

Images of shtetl appear on canvas

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Mayer Kirshenblatt's extraordinary memory of his childhood in Poland and his late-in-life passion for painting have provided him with the window of opportunity to recreate the images of life in the shtetl.

The sprightly painter and storyteller, who is in his late 70s, recently returned from a six-week stay in Poland where, by special invitation, he participated in the fifth Jewish cultural festival in Krakow, where he was one of the Jewish performers and lecturers from around the world.

He also lectured at the summer program of New York University (NYU), in cooperation with Krakow's Jagiellonian University. As he is bilingual, Kirshenblatt lectures in both Polish and English.

Over the past four years, he has completed more than 120 paintings depicting the day to day scenes of his family and shtetl life in Opatow (Apt), Poland. At the festival, where the program included concerts, exhibitions, theatre and workshops on Jewish themes, Kirshenblatt presented slides of his works and explained the significance and traditions of each painting.

He says he was overwhelmed by the response of the sold-out audiences and the enthusiasm for Jewish themes shown by the Polish people, more than 99 per cent non-Jews, who came from across the country.

"They loved the music and programs," he says, his blue eyes sparkling. "They danced, clapped hands and called for more and more encores. They asked questions and expressed great interest in Jewish events."

He says he noticed that "among the Polish intelligentsia, it is becoming stylish to have Jewish ancestry — parents or grandparents."

He calls this the "phantom limb syndrome," making the analogy that "the limb still hurts even though it is no longer there."

Kirshenblatt discovered that many hidden children who didn't know they were Jewish are now being told the truth by aging Polish parents and some are going to Israel to find their relatives.

The Muzeum Etnograficzne (Anthropological Museum in Krakow has requested a set of Kirshenblatt's slides and copies of his lectures, which will become part of the museum's archives and be used for teaching purposes.

He was accompanied by his wife Dora, who also participated in the NYU lectures, where she told proverbs and parables she learned from her mother.

"Young people, some who have never met a Jewish person, are anxious to know about our culture and life," says Dora.

For 10 years, their oldest daughter, Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, urged her father to recreate her grandmother's kitchen in Opatow.

Mayer Kirshenblatt

He was reluctant but finally with Dora's urging, he began the process that has led to international recognition of his contribution to Jewish history.

He came to Canada when he was 17. His father opened Reliable Paint and Wallpaper on Dundas Street and Mayer worked for his father painting houses. After serving in the army for three years in the Northwest Territories, he established the Wallpaper and Paint Centre on Roncesvalles.

He says after he retired at the age of 60, "That's when my new life began."

Mayer has travelled extensively, demonstrating the almost extinct art of Eastern European Jewish folk toy making. He teaches children and adults to create puppets, trumpets from willow bark, whistles and miniature furniture out of household scraps.

Jack Kuper Enterprises recently completed a documentary on Kirshenblatt's paintings titled, The Shtetl. It will be screened this fall on local TV stations.

A new, fascinating work of Jewish legal history

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

After 10 years of research which took historians and architectural preservationists Judy and Sheldon Godfrey across Canada, England and the Caribbean and down the east coast of the United States, the husband and wife team recently published their third book, Search Out the Land — the Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America, 1740-1867 (McGill: Queen's University Press).

Their extensive archival, genealogical and legal research highlights the significant role the Jews played in Canada during that period. It is a ground-breaking legal history of the context of equality found among the diverse populations which inhabited Canada before Confederation — French Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists and Quakers.

Irving Abella of the York University History Department says it is "a fascinating work. The Godfreys have gone well beyond where previous scholars have been, and have asked questions — and, more importantly, found answers — no one asked before."

From his boyhood, Sheldon had a passion for history. He graduated from the University of Toronto and completed a master's degree in Canadian history at the University of Rochester before returning to Toronto in 1961 to study law. A law partner with the late Senator David Croll, he developed a great appreciation of early Ontario architecture.

Judy and Sheldon were married in 1961. Judy says she did not have an interest in history until "Sheldon's enthusiasm rubbed off on me." She then studied architectural history and learned how to identify and assess historic buildings.

Sheldon and Judy began a working partnership when Sheldon persuaded his father that he and Judy could restore a family owned property at 49 Front St. E.

The building, one of only three buildings in Ontario with the facade made entirely of cast iron, was designated an historical building by the Ontario Heritage Foundation, which gave the Godfreys a small grant toward the restoration. Since its completion in 1979, the building has been fully rented.

The Godfreys went on to purchase and renovate a four-building block on Adelaide Street which had been gutted by fire. The buildings included the Bank of Upper Canada (1827), Toronto's first post office (1833) and De La Salle School (1872). These have also been fully rented since their renovation.

For the official opening of the post office-museum, exactly 150 years after its construction, the Godfreys wrote Stones, Bricks and History.

The Godfreys have clearly demonstrated that heritage buildings can be restored and made a viable, financial success.

In 1981, the Godfreys received the City of Toronto Award of Merit. They were also awarded the Heritage Canada National Award of Honor and the Credit Foncier Award.

Sheldon, one of Canada's foremost Jewish genealogists of the early period, is presently chair of the Board of Governors of the Heritage Canada Foundation. He was elected Governor of Heritage Canada representing Ontario.

Judy's hobby is adaptively revising early textiles. She was one of the first women on the board of Beth Tzedec Synagogue and she served as vice chair of Ontario's Conservation Review Board.

Canada's Holocaust stamp (inset) bears the likeness of Robert Engel (above). Joining him are the stamp's design team, (from left) Peter Scott, Darrell Corriveau and Glenda Rissman.

Stamped into history

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

The task was daunting: to sum up the systematic, state-sanctioned extermination of six million European Jews and convey the unspeakable horrors of the Holocaust, all on a piece of paper measuring just 3 by 4.8 centimetres.

The project was a far cry from the CD covers, posters and annual reports which normally occupy the principals of Toronto's Q30 Designs Inc.

But after poring over stacks of photographs and immersing themselves in the subject for months, the designers got it right, it seems. Canada's 45-cent stamp marking the 50th anniversary of the end of the Holocaust and honoring its victims has won wide praise for both its sensitivity and its hard-hitting visual impact.

The stamp was unveiled last month — on the 57th anniversary of Kristallnacht — in an emotional ceremony on Parliament Hill in Ottawa, attended by David Dingwall, the minister responsible for Canada Post, and hundreds of Holocaust survivors and their loved ones.

What's particularly poignant about it — as well as being a first in Canadian philately — is that the partial face of Robert Engel, a well-known Toronto Holocaust survivor and educator, is among those depicted in the stamp's photo collage of authentic artifacts from the era. Engel's young likeness is featured on his old ID card, issued in Holland in 1941 and marked "J" for Jew in the lower half of the stamp. Federal law states that no living person, except the Queen, can be pictured on a Canadian stamp, but this somehow slipped by.

Engel, 71, is blase about the honor. He would rather that everyone who uses the stamp pause and think about one of the victims of the Holocaust.

Canada Post contacted Q30 Design last summer after receiving several letters suggesting a Holocaust-themed stamp, one of them from Chabad-Lubavitch in Vancouver. The firm then got in touch with Toronto's Holocaust Remembrance Committee, which collects authentic memorabilia in the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

In the end, the designers chose Engel's ID card, a yellow Star of David badge and an authentic concentration camp uniform jacket which had belonged to the late Jacob Wiener of Montreal.

The row of photographs along the top, showing unknown victims and chosen for the silent agony they convey, came from the Imperial War Museum in Ottawa.

"Our goal was not to offend survivors and other groups, but Canada Post said the stamp should make people a bit uncomfortable," says designer Glenda Rissman. "Initially, the challenge was very overwhelming. We had a lot of trepidation over how to adequately depict this on a tiny piece of paper."

Adds her partner Peter Scott, "The Holocaust tends to be trivialized. We wanted to depict the fact that it affected everyone's life."

Even the smallest details were considered: The perforations occur along a face to symbolize the tearing apart of families; the edges of the ID card were burned and parts of the yellow badge etched out to denote destruction; the lettering is slightly askew. The designers even persuaded Canada Post to make the denomination and "Canada" slightly smaller than normal so as not to detract from the impact.

"There's nothing frivolous or gratuitous about it," says Scott.

Says Rissman, "I don't know if we could face anything as difficult again."

Which bagel is better?

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When I was growing up, there were two types of bagels — sesame and poppy seed.

But bagels have become the new designer food of the '90s. They come in as many flavors as donuts. Bakeries offer bagels in such flavors as banana, carrot, blueberry and chocolate chip.

Chocolate chip bagels!? Just the perfect thing for lox and cream cheese, eh?

In my book, if a bagel doesn't go with lox and cream cheese, it isn't a real bagel.

Of course, there are many Montrealers who would argue that the only real bagels on this planet are from Montreal. They're smaller, chewier and sweeter than the Toronto variety.

The great Montreal-Toronto bagel debate began when the waves of Montrealers settled in Toronto in the late '70s and early '80s. Many of them disparaged Toronto's blandness and lack of nightlife.

But it was the Toronto bagel, larger and fluffier than its Montreal counterpart, that bore the brunt of their criticism. Montrealers often referred to it as "that bread with a hole."

Now, it may be treasonous for a former Montrealer to say this, but I have eaten Toronto bagels on many occasions and I enjoyed every bite.

However, these days, former Montrealers who previously shunned Toronto bagels need no longer go without. Several Toronto bakeries (including some kosher ones) now produce the Montreal-style variety. I think they taste pretty good. And a survey I personally conducted a few weeks ago confirmed my opinion.

But according to my mother, who's an authority on such matters, nothing tastes as good as the real thing. So whenever she visits Toronto, she schleps a two-month supply of bagels for each of her three children. She gets off the train from Montreal with four suitcases — one with clothes and three with bagels. When she comes by car, we get a four-month supply.

Ironically, my attachment to Montreal bagels is rooted more in nostalgia than in taste. They evoke memories of my university days, when my friends and I would visit the 24-hour bagel shop on St. Viateur Street on cold wintry nights. We would devour bags of hot bagels, fresh from the oven.

The steam would escape into the cold air with every bite, but the dough was so hot you really couldn't taste the bagels.

When it comes to rating bagels, I suppose it all boils down to à chacun son goût (to each his own taste). As to what constitutes a real bagel? No doubt this will be a topic hotly debated well into the next century.

Exotic flavored bagels could become a permanent trend. Look what happened to the lowly bran muffin in the '80s.

When it comes to bagels, I consider myself to be fairly open-minded, but I am not prepared to call every bun with a hole a bagel. I draw the line at chocolate chip.

Leigh, 10, demonstrates proper bagel-eating technique.

Refugee ruling 'scary'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Officials who work with Jewish refugee claimants to Canada were trying to overcome their stunned disbelief last week at a Federal Court of Canada ruling that could, at least in theory, spell an end to all claims by Jews for asylum in Canada.

Immigration lawyers and officials at Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) were scrambling to make sense of the controversial ruling which upheld an earlier Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) decision denying asylum to a 65-year-old woman from Azerbaijan on the grounds that as a Jew, she could go live in Israel.

The decision, if viewed as a precedent, could theoretically mean that from now on, no Jewish claimants will receive refugee status in Canada.

Some see in the ruling, made Nov. 23 but released last week, a perverse twist to Canada's wartime "none is too many" policy on Jewish immigration – a new way to exclude an entire group of people from seeking refuge here.

On Monday, JIAS was busy setting up a conference call with Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canada-Israel Committee. The groups were trying to establish whether the ruling will set a precedent or whether it is specific to this case only.

If precedent-setting, "it could have very large implications for the Jewish community," said JIAS acting national director Perry Romberg.

The ruling upheld an IRB decision last November, which said Antonina Grygorian, who was born in Moscow, was entitled to Russian citizenship and should have sought protection there.

School named for Rabin

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The new Ottawa Jewish high school, which opened its doors in September, will honor the memory of Yitzhak Rabin by being named after the late Israeli prime minister.

Nameless until now, it will be called Yitzhak Rabin High School; and in Hebrew, Midreshet Ner Yitzhak, which roughly translates as Candle of Isaac Academy.

Neima Langner, chair of the school's board of directors, announced the name at a ceremony held in Ottawa to mark shloshim, the end of the 30 days of mourning for Rabin.

"As a collaborative school that seeks to foster among its students a sense of klal Israel, we will be honored to carry the name of one who confronted the challenge of polarization, entrenched enmity and distrust and who sought reconciliation," Langner read from a letter the school board sent to Rabin's widow, Leah.

"We seek to develop broad-minded, well-informed Jews, knowledgeable in their religious traditions and committed to their community, who will be the leaders of the next century.

Anti-Racism Programs

VANCOUVER — Hundreds of students in British Columbia's interior have attended anti-racism programs organized in Nelson, Vernon and Kelowna by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC-P), with support from the B.C. Teachers Federation.

The students heard from Auschwitz survivor Bronia Sonnenschein and Judy Zack, a child of Holocaust survivors.

Marilyn Berger, associate director of CJC-P, estimates 400 students attended the Nelson symposium and more than 700 were at the events in Vernon and Kelowna.

ISRAEL

Promise on PoWs

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Shimon Peres has promised Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that he would launch an investigation into reports that Israeli soldiers killed Egyptian Prisoners of War (PoWs) during the 1956 Sinai campaign and 1967 Six Day War.

Peres' commitment to hold the probe represents a turnaround from the stance of the late Yitzhak Rabin, who refused to investigate the allegations.

Reports of the killings of Egyptian PoWs, which first surfaced in the Israeli press earlier this year, have sparked tensions between Israel and Egypt.

Crucial Videotape?

JERUSALEM — In a development that could shed crucial light on security breaches surrounding Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, Justice Ministry officials have confirmed they have an amateur videotape of the peace rally Rabin attended moments before he was shot.

Israeli TV reported that the tape, shot from a high vantage point, clearly showed the assassination. But a high-ranking security official said it just missed the moment of the shooting, although it did show about 60 people near Rabin's car.

Rabbi Levinger Sentenced

JERUSALEM — A Jerusalem court last week sentenced Jewish settler leader Rabbi Moshe Levinger to six months in jail and a six-month suspended sentence for causing a violent disturbance in the Hebron market four years ago.

Rabbi Levinger was convicted of damaging Arab property and firing his gun. He maintained that he had responded to Arab stonethrowers.

The date for beginning the sentence was put off until the end of the month to allow Rabbi Levinger time to file an appeal.

Kahane Convicted

JERUSALEM — A court here overturned a lower court's ruling last week and convicted Kahane Chai leader Benjamin Kahane of sedition and publishing seditious material.

Last year, a magistrate's court acquitted Kahane of the charge, arguing there must be a "high degree of probability" that public order would be disturbed for such material to be considered seditious.

In overturning the ruling, the district court noted that not only was there a reasonable chance that the distribution of Kahane's leaflets would have caused racist acts, but that they would have almost certainly done so.

Sentencing will be at a later date.

Another Quake

JERUSALEM — For the second time in four days, a tremor shook southern Israel and northeastern Egypt last Monday, but there were no reports of damages or injuries.

The tremor, measuring 5.1 on the Richter scale, was centred in the Gulf of Aqaba.

Four days earlier, a tremor measuring 4.9 shook southern Israel. No damages or injuries were reported.

Officials at Israel's seismological institute said the tremors were part of a series of aftershocks following a powerful earthquake that hit the region on Nov. 22, causing 10 deaths and at least 69 injuries.

WORLD

Priest At It Again

WARSAW — A prominent Roman Catholic priest in Poland — a close friend of outgoing president Lech Walesa — has again made anti-Semitic statements in his Gdansk church.

Rev. Henryk Jankowski created a furor in June, when he made anti-Semitic remarks during a service at the church while Walesa was in attendance.

The Warsaw daily Gazeta Wyborcza reported that on Dec. 3, Rev. Jankowski said, "Why shouldn't we talk about such things as the murder of Germans by Jews? Why may we not talk about the Jewish-Communist administration that governs Poland today? The reason is that they have banks and everything in their hands.

"I have nothing to repent for and none to whom I should apologize for my words," Rev. Jankowski added.

Greek Jew Honored

ATHENS — The bust of a Greek Jewish colonel who died during the 1940 Italian invasion of Greece was unveiled this month at the War Museum here.

Col. Mordocheos Frizis was the first high-ranking Greek officer to die during the Italian invasion.

Government officials, representatives of the Greek Jewish community and family members were among those at the Dec. 4 ceremony.

Considered an Insult...

ROME — Nearly half those questioned here in a public opinion poll said they would consider it an insult to be called a Jew, and nearly 12 per cent said they thought of Jews as "unpleasant."

The survey, which polled 1,050 adult Italians, showed that 53 per cent of respondents said they would be offended if called a "Negro;" 47 per cent said they would be offended if called a Jew; and 44 per cent would be offended if called gay.

More than 75 per cent of those polled said they did not consider themselves racist.

Peres on Pollard

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Shimon Peres has asked U.S. President Bill Clinton to pardon Jonathan Pollard, who is serving a life sentence in the United States for spying for Israel.

Peres was said to have pressed for the pardon personally when he met Clinton in Washington last week.

Last month, Pollard was granted Israeli citizenship. He feels that being an Israeli citizen will improve his chances at a future parole hearing, his lawyer has said.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

This has been a tradition in our family for four generations.

Jewish groups urged to help women in need

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish organizations were exhorted last week to go beyond their mandates and respond to the needs of Jewish women affected by Ontario government cutbacks to community agencies.

Speaking at a panel discussion sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) on Government Cutbacks: Women at Risk, Susan Davis advised representatives of Jewish organizations that even a modest response to one aspect of need has "tremendous impact."

Davis is on secondment from Jewish Immigrant Aid Services as special adviser to the assistant deputy minister, national services sector, Citizenship and Immigration.

Diamond Centre residence to close, see pg. 7

Other panelists at the event held at Adath Israel Congregation were Susan Pigott, acting president of the United Way of Greater Toronto; Morris Zbar, assistant executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT); Sandy Keshen, executive director of Reena; and Debbie Feldman, director of rehab for Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

Glennie Lindenberg, JWF president, moderated the evening. Sandra Brown, JFGT president, and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation also spoke.

Lindenberg cited the following statistics:

- One out of seven Jews in Toronto lives at or below the poverty line.
- Fifty-seven per cent of the Jewish poor are women.
- Single-parent families, 82 per cent of which are headed by women, are more likely to be poor.

Cutbacks have also forced the cancellation of some Reena and Kehilla residential program projects,

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl was raised by a single mother who was not always able to work, he said. Without the "tangible support" of both government and the Jewish institutions of Chicago, he suggested that he would be neither a rabbi nor "what I hope is a good parent."

Pigott stressed the crunch represented by recent across-the-board cuts to social service agencies of 2.5 per cent, made by Ontario Premier Mike Harris' government, with a further 5 per cent cut expected in April.

"[United Way] agencies are not overfunded. For many agencies these cuts eat into programs," she said.

"Private philanthropy cannot begin to close the gap."

Women will be particularly affected, she noted, because of job loss in the health care, education and social services sectors (81 per cent of health care workers are women), and because cuts will increase women's already disproportionate family responsibilities in the areas of child care and elder care.

The situation in Ontario is reflected "throughout North America and all western democracies," said Zbar. He noted that further cuts will be implemented with the 1996-97 budget.

In Toronto, recent welfare cuts of 21.6 per cent mean that at least 2,000 local Jews (500 JF&CS cases) have less money every month.

For the short term, the federation will have a transition fund to lessen the blow of government cutbacks, while exploring longer-term strategies.

* * *

The "community transition fund" was announced last week by the federation as "an unprecedented step" towards assisting its beneficiary agencies.

The JFGT's board authorized the fund to help agencies adapt to drastically reduced government spending.

"This is not a replacement for government's funding," stressed Alan Sandler, vice-president of Community Planning & Allocations for the federation. "We want to help them finance necessary restructuring."

Grants will be issued only when an agency presents a business plan that demonstrates the way in which it will use the money over what is expected to be 18 months.

The fund, to be formed through private contributions, could amount to several hundred thousand dollars, but the precise amount will not be determined until preliminary consultations are conducted between the federation and community agencies.

The federation estimates that Jewish agencies could lose up to $30 million in government funding during the next year and a half.

Agencies feel the pinch

Among the Jewish agencies affected by government budget cuts are:

- The Bernard Betel Centre, to which at least 100 seniors no longer have access due to cuts in Wheel Trans service;
- The Bathurst Jewish Centre, where 32 subsidized daycare spots are at risk.
- JF&CS, where almost $400,000 (provincial and municipal funding) has been cut from the 1996 budget. The child welfare budget, family violence services and family support programs will be directly affected. About 300 women who are or have been in abusive relationships are affected, along with over 600 of their children.
- Jewish Vocational Service, which has lost the funding for one job creation position. Nine other staff positions have also been terminated and two staff on leave without pay have not been replaced. Clients who don't have access to day care will have difficulty attending training programs because they will have nowhere to leave their children.
- Reena, where a housing project intended for 48 individuals including adults with developmental disabilities and single mothers with disabled children has been terminated. 'We must prevent the destruction of Canada'

From the editor's desk

This is the last column from the editor's desk in 1995.

It has been a difficult year for Jewish Canadians, especially in the past 10 weeks.

The awful, cold-blooded murder of Yitzhak Rabin marked the blackest day yet in post-Holocaust Jewish history. No words of comfort or explanation or rationalization can abate so unabatable a loss. Like a heavy ugly stone cast deep into the waters of modern Jewish existence, the assassination is still sending ripples that disturb the reflection of what used to be seen on the water's clear surface. I cannot find new insights to interpret the still rippling surface.

A week before Rabin was slain, thus adding to the severe emotional strain and anxiety of the past 2 1/2 months, was the separatists' referendum – its maddening prelude, its nail-biting result, and its alarming epilogue.

A substantial number of young Montrealers are once again pondering the advisability of putting down roots in a province which appears increasingly inhospitable to them. Even older Montrealers are privately weighing the same question now. Understandably, the community in Montreal feels threatened and isolated.

Understandably too, all Canadians are feeling greater and greater frustration with the separatists in Quebec City and in Ottawa. And this heightened frustration is leading to a hardening of attitude on the part of some Canadians, a desire to simply be "rid" of an alienated and alienating group which is constantly finding fault with the rest of Canada, which has already promised more referenda, and which shows more and more traces of an ugly xenophobia peeking at the edges of their movement.

At all costs, Canadians must resist this hardening of attitude. It is short-sighted, self-defeating and foolish. For, being "rid" of Quebec also means being "rid" of Canada. As we have written in the past, as others have written in the past, and as is written elsewhere in this issue of The CJN, without Quebec, Canada will cease to exist. To think otherwise is simply to deny the economic, social and political realities of an increasingly economically and culturally integrating North America.

The separatists' strategy is to irritate and frustrate the rest of Canada. Hence former premier Jacques Parizeau used the analogy of the constant "toothache." Hence Lucien Bouchard declared on the very morrow of the referendum that he and his followers would never accept the finality of a No vote.

But Canadians must not surrender to our frustration. However deep the provocation, however justified the anger, we must find the strength and the wisdom to persevere in a united federalist cause. To do otherwise is to concede victory to the separatists.

Thus, Jewish Canadians have responsibilities at two levels: as Canadians bound by love, duty and responsibility toward Canada and as Jews bound by community and kinship to our fellow Jews in Quebec.

As Canadians, we must prevent the destruction of Canada by the separatist forces. As Jews, we must reach out to the community in Montreal to counterbalance feelings of isolation and their fears of possible demographic desolation.

A member of our family is in trouble. Shall we simply turn our back? We must not.

Yoine Goldstein, incoming president of FEDERATION CJA in Montreal, wrote the following words for his acceptance of the presidency. His remarks eloquently express the feeling of Jewish community and the inter-generational, inter-millennial, inter-national responsibility one for the other that flows from that feeling.

"We recognize, you and I, that we are not strangers. We are inextricably connected. Our connection goes back as far as Sinai. That connectedness has been a continuum for thousands of years. Our recognition of that connectedness is essential to our well-being because it makes us remember our connection to each other and if we remember that we are connected to each other, then we take responsibility for one another and we accept our responsibilities to each other individually and as a people.

"I therefore invite you to continue that connectedness, to continue, each of us, to see ourselves as being responsible to ourselves and for each other."

Seeing ourselves as being "responsible to ourselves and for each other" is precisely how Jews outside Quebec should respond to the situation of Jews inside Quebec. That response must take tangible, not merely theoretical, shape. This is as true of our civic response as Canadians as it is of our communal response as Jews. As we witnessed on the weekend before the referendum, actions by individuals, when organized, focussed and sincere, can indeed make a difference.

Our civic response must be aimed at pressuring and mobilizing colleagues and friends and local decision makers such as editorial writers and media persons to influence elected officials, at all three levels of government – municipal, provincial and federal – to take all reasonable steps to find constitutional accommodation.

Our communal response must be aimed at demonstrating understanding, support and empathy for the anxiety being felt by our fellow Jews in Montreal. At every level possible – individually, and organizationally through synagogues, landsmanshaften, schools, federations and even through business – there should be as much contact as possible with Montrealers.

The Montreal Jewish community was once the diadem in Canada's jewelled world. It is smaller now. Populations have shifted in the past two decades. But it still sparkles; it still radiates with innovation, self-confidence, tradition, integrity and moral force. Fighting to keep Quebec in Canada, and thus Canada for all Canadians, will also ensure that Montreal's sparkle lasts forever. We owe that to ourselves as Canadians and as Jews.

Skating Through the Sand

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hockey on New Year's Eve has become something of a tradition in Canada, and this year, fans of the world's coolest game will be treated to a hockey story that comes from a land known more for deserts and heatwaves than frostshields and windchill factors.

The genesis and development of hockey in Israel is the subject of a one-hour film titled Skating Through the Sand that will air on the Baton Broadcasting System (BBS) at 8 p.m. on Dec. 31.

Produced by Wayne Abbott and Danny Roth, Skating Through the Sand brings viewers an inside look at the people who have pushed hockey in Israel from being a mere curiosity to its current status as a developing sport with loads of potential.

Shot over a five-week period in March 1995, the film visits the Israeli team's home base in Bat Yam and follows the boys in blue to an International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Group C tournament in Johannesburg, South Africa.

While the movie is full of game action and pretty goals, what elevates the film are the human stories that gives Skating Through the Sand a universal appeal.

Who could fail to be moved by the story of Simeon Yakubovitch, the Soviet-born coach of the Israeli nationals as he recounts an earlier life in the former Soviet Union where he led a special army chemical unit into Chernobyl to repair the damage caused by the nuclear reactor.

Of the entire unit he led (about a dozen men), Yakubovitch is the only survivor. Six months is much too long to have spent in Chernobyl, he said, as he casts his gaze downward.

There's also the story of Roy Annau, a non-Jew from Wawa, Ont. who as a young man was fascinated by the story of the Jewish people and Israel. He went on a visit to Israel and stayed for life.

Annau scored Israel's first-ever goal in international competition and his dedication to the game becomes clear as he describes his journey to games in Bat Yam from his home in Kibbutz Ein Gedi, near the Dead Sea. The image of Annau at a desert bus stop, with hockey stick in hand and equipment bag at his feet, is as surrealistic as anything painted by Dali.

Others profiled in the fascinating film include Toronto-born Paul Shindman, who almost single-handedly kickstarted hockey in Israel; Oded Orgil, the Israeli-born resident of Toronto who plays for the nationals; Mike Rubin, a Toronto-born oleh; and Evgeny Feldman, a Russian-born oleh who's currently playing junior hockey in Canada.

The film also takes you to Metulla to meet with young Canadians who are teaching Israelis the rudiments of skating and hockey.

The film was a labor of love that has taken up the last year-and-a-half of his life, said Roth. "I came up with the concept in August 1994 and took it to Wayne in September. It's been my focus and goal. My friends are sick of hearing about it.

"It's absolutely not limited to a Jewish audience. I think it has wide appeal," Roth said.

The national team consists of Russians, Canadians, a Bulgarian and sabras. "Hockey became a metaphor for the country. It was a journey for respectability and acceptance, just like the state," Roth said.

Israeli left stifling debate, Likudnik asserts

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Left-wing Israeli politicians are attempting to "create a climate of fear" and "stifle legitimate political debate" in the wake of the Rabin assassination, a prominent Likud MK asserted here last week.

Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres has not done enough "at this point of crisis to show sensitivity and heal the wounds" opened by the murder of Rabin, said Uzi Landau, chair of Likud's policy committee.

In a wide-ranging interview prior to addressing a public meeting at the Beth David-B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, Landau said Peres' top priority should be to create peace among the people of Israel.

"We believe that peace should start at home. We believe you can't find peace with your enemies when at home you drive a wedge that could tear your society apart."

Landau, an 11-year Knesset veteran, suggested the "political leaders of the left" have engaged in a "witch-hunt" against those who oppose the current peace process.

He painted a grisly picture of a democratically elected goverment lashing out at its opponents and of scapegoating the religious/nationalist camp in Israel.

Where was Jewish unity in New York when the Israeli consulate asked that Likud representatives be prevented from participating in a solidarity rally to mark the end of the 30 day mourning period following Rabin's death? he asked.

In Israel, police have interrogated people for casual remarks made at restaurants.

With the media alerted, rabbis have been questioned by police and photographed entering and exiting police headquarters, suggesting some sort of guilt.

On the streets of Israel, people have been "called down" just because they are wearing yarmulkes, he said.

"It's a very uncomfortable situation in a democracy ... It's completely unacceptable to blame part of a society for the deeds of one individual," Landau said.

A member of the Knesset's constitution and law committee, Landau suggested that "some political leaders of the left are keeping up that momentum until the next election" (in 1996), in the hope that it would help elect another Labor-led government.

They are also using the current climate in Israel to forge ahead with concessions in the peace process "without making it easy for public debate and criticism to be levelled against it," he suggested.

Uzi Landau

If elected, Likud would re-examine Israel's policies and push an autonomy model for the Palestinians that would not lead to an independent state. However, "we won't march into those areas given to the Palestinians."

Turning to Syria, Landau said the Israeli government is "following a path that's dangerous for our future."

Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad hasn't changed his position in four years but Israel continues to offer concessions without getting anything in return. Landau said he fears Peres is itching to make a deal with Syria that he can take to the electorate in 1996.

Acting with such haste would be too risky for Israel, he said.

Landau's address was sponsored by Herud Likud — Betar Tagar of Canada and the following synagogues: Adath Israel, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Beth David-B'nai Israel Beth Am, Beth Sholom and Shaar Shalom.

New Ottawa Jewish high school named after Yitzhak Rabin

"Your husband embodied strength, courage, vision and inspiration; qualities essential for leadership in both war and peace," she read.

The school's name was proposed by Shayna Levitan, a Grade 8 student at Ottawa's Hillel Academy.

"I think naming our community high school after a hero like Yitzhak Rabin will add honor not just to the students and faculty of our school, but also to the name of a great Jewish leader," she wrote in her entry to the school-naming contest.

Langner said the "candle" in the school's Hebrew name refers to light and the mitzvah of lighting candles, as well as to the vigils held in Israel and abroad when Rabin died.

"The candle symbolizes the candles we lit at the time of Rabin's death and it symbolizes the aims of the high school to build bridges between different streams of Jewish society," she said.

The full-day co-ed high school currently has 14 Grade 9 and 10 students studying a Jewish and secular curriculum. A Grade 11 class will be added next year in the first term and the school is working extremely well, said Langner.

It is a model collaborative high school, she said, where all the teachers share ideas and teaching techniques and the students benefit.

Author outlines West's 'war against the Jews'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

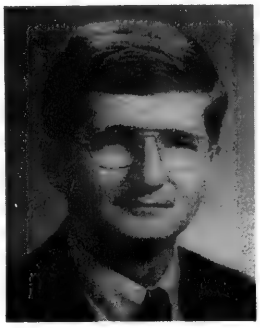
TORONTO — In a night of incredible revelations, it would be difficult to determine which was the most sensational.

Was it that Israel attacked the U.S. spy ship Liberty during the 1967 Six-Day war because it was passing crucial information about IDF deployments to Israel's Arab enemies?

Or that in 1948, a Jew with access to British intelligence obtained from Czechoslovakia badly needed arms for Israel in exchange for information that Britain was backing a coup by former fascists?

Perhaps it was that the United States came down hard on convicted spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard because U.S. leaders mistakenly believed the information he passed to Israel got into the hands of a Soviet mole and led to the deaths of 40 of their agents.

How about the assertion that "Zionists," knowing that Nelson Rockefeller did business with the Nazis during World War II, blackmailed the business tycoon into strong-arming Latin American countries for their UN votes for the creation of Israel?



John Loftus

True or not, the dramatic tidbits revealed by former U.S. Nazi-hunter John Loftus had his audience of 200 on the edge of their seats, gasping with amazement at times, spellbound at others. His speech was sponsored by the new leadership division of State of Israel Bonds. Howard Alter was the evening's honoree.

An orator of considerable talent, Loftus, co-author of The Secret War Against the Jews, presented a behind-the-scenes look at the machinations of U.S. and British intelligence, whose operations frequently made Jews and Israel the fall guys as they curried favor with oil-rich Arab states.

Jews and Israel are considered expendable by key elements of Western intelligence because oil is considered the paramount issue, he said.

Loftus, a former member of the Office of Special Investigation (OSI), the U.S. Justice Department unit established to prosecute Nazi war criminals, said he first learned of this world of subterfuge when examining U.S. archives in Maryland.

He learned that British and U.S. intelligence recruited anti-Nazi freedom fighters, many of them war criminals. for an anti-Soviet army.

When war with the Soviets did not occur, the British dumped "the dregs of the anti-communist nationalists" in the West. Canada received 15,000.

"It's my belief that next to Buenos Aires, Toronto has the highest per capita residence of Nazi war criminals of any other city in the world," he said.

"Let's face it. You ended up as a dumping ground and your government doesn't have the guts to tell you."

Loftus illustrated the links of Western intelligence to Nazis by referring to the diary of a Partisan fighter named Solomon, who survived the slaughter that wiped out his family.

When Solomon moved to the United States after the war, he described a prominent SS commander in his memoirs.

The diary was consigned to a shelf in the archives because that collaborator had been recruited by the United States and given a job broadcasting on radio behind the Iron Curtain.

During Israel's War of Independence, the Jewish state could not obtain arms from the West, but a young Czech Jew learned of the British-backed coup plot. He traded that information for arms. That young Czech would later change his name to Robert Maxwell, and later be given a state burial by a grateful Israel, Loftus said.

Loftus' theories are not without controversy. Abe Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, has circulated a three-page letter warning that Loftus' book is "exaggerated, scantily documented, overwrought and convoluted..."

For his part, Loftus claims that "Jews around the world [don't] have a clue about their own history. It's buried" in intelligence archives, he said.

Lawyer for alleged war criminal asks court for gov't documents

TORONTO — Government authorities should be ordered to disclose the documents that outline their change of strategy on war crimes prosecutions, a lawyer for an alleged war criminal urged the Federal Court last week.

Ottawa lawyer Donald Bayne made the motion to support a claim that federal authorities abused the legal process by launching denaturalization/deportation proceedings against his client, Johann Dueck, 76.

Dueck would have less legal protection under immigration procedures than if he was charged criminally, Bayne argued. The government's decision to forego criminal prosecutions in favor of stripping suspects of citizenship and deporting them was never debated in parliament. As a result, the government should be forced to disclose documents, including cabinet papers, outlining that decision, he said.

The government decision to change tacks came in the wake of a Supreme Court of Canada judgment in the Imre Finta case. Federal authorities announced that successful criminal prosecutions would be too difficult in light of the decision and it switched its strategy to the denaturalization and deportation remedy.

Three alleged war criminals, Erichs Tobiass, 84, of Toronto, Helmut Oberlander, 71, of Waterloo and Dueck were named as suspects. Federal authorities say they participated in the execution of civilians during World War II.

A fourth suspect, Josef Nemsila, never became a Canadian citizen. He faces deportation, but that case has become bogged down in legal arguments on the question of domicile.

Associate Chief Justice James Jerome, who is also hearing the Nemsila case, adjourned proceedings until February, when prosecution lawyers will reply.

Former Nazi agrees to leave United States

WASHINGTON — A former SS man, who lived in Canada from 1948-57, has permanently departed the United States after signing an agreement acknowledging he misrepresented his past in order to obtain U.S. citizenship.

Wasyl Lytwyn, 73, a retired shipping clerk from Chicago, was a member of the infamous guard units of the Trawniki SS training and base camp and its successor unit, the SS Streibel Battalion, from 1943 to April 1945, said the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations (OSI).

The Trawniki camp was used to train guards and police to assist in the Nazi's program of murdering the Jews of Europe.

A complaint filed in court by the OSI in order to strip Lytwyn of his citizenship alleges he took part in the destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto in April and May 1943.

The complaint also states that Lytwyn served in the guard detachment of the SS and Police Leader in Lublin and later in the Streibel Battalion.

Between August 1944 and January 1945, the Streibel Battalion seized tens of thousands of Polish civilians and supervised them while they worked as slave laborers constructing fortifications in central Poland, the complaint states.

Prior to departing the United States for Ukraine, Lytwyn signed an agreement with the OSI in which he admitted he obtained U.S. citizenship fraudulently and that he wilfully misrepresented his wartime activities. The court complaint to remove his citizenship was launched pursuant to the terms of that agreement.

According to the complaint, Lytwyn immigrated to Canada in 1948 and obtained citizenship in 1955. He moved to the United States in 1957 and in 1994 became a U.S. citizen.

Since its inception in 1979, the OSI has removed 44 Nazi persecutors from the United States while more than 300 are currently under investigation.

'Routine' UN resolutions critical of Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada has voted with most of the world in calling on Israel to abandon its administration over all Jerusalem and to demand that Israel withdraw from the Golan Heights.

The votes, described as routine, annual resolutions, were passed earlier this month by the United Nations' General Assembly. And although it may seem that Canada is still being unduly harsh on the Jewish state, Ottawa's votes on the three resolutions are seen as nothing new.

Israel cast the only vote against a resolution calling its decision to impose its laws and administration over Jerusalem illegal, null and void.

Canada, along with 132 other countries, voted for the resolution. The United States was one of 13 countries to abstain.

Ottawa's vote "maintains [its] voting patterns and reflects a long-standing policy" that eastern Jerusalem is "occupied territory," Rodney Moore, a spokesperson for the Department of Foreign Affairs, told The CJN. "It does not reflect a change in our policy."

The resolution also deplored the transfer to Jerusalem by some nations of their diplomatic missions, terming such moves a violation of a 1980 Security Council resolution.

The U.S. Congress voted in October to transfer its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem by 1999. Canada called the American decision an undue bid to influence the city's final status and said its embassy will stay in Tel Aviv.

Israel and the United States cast the only votes against another resolution demanding the Jewish state withdraw from all the Golan Heights to the line it occupied June 4, 1967, the day before the outbreak of the Six Day War.

Canada voted for the resolution because "we don't feel we should prejudice discussions between Israel and Syria," Moore explained.

Although similar to resolutions adopted in previous years, this one, for the first time, specified the June 4, 1967 line, rather than calling for a full withdrawal.

The vote on this draft was 66 to two, with 79 abstentions.

The third resolution, expressing full support for the achievements of the Middle East peace process so far and stressing the need for rapid progress in other Arab-Israeli negotiations, was approved by a vote of 148 to four, with one abstention.

The four negative votes were cast by Iran and Libya, which oppose the entire peace process, and by Lebanon and Syria, whose talks with Israel have made the least progress. Sudan abstained.

According to Shimon Fogel of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), Ottawa's votes on the three resolutions do not represent a significant shift in its Israel policy.

In fact, the CIC sees in the votes an improvement from the days when the UN passed "dozens" of anti-Israel resolutions, many of them in one-shot "baskets." Today, says Fogel, those resolutions are far fewer, and on an individual basis.

JF&CS to close home for troubled Jewish youths

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the wake of drastic provincial budget cuts, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) will close Ontario's only residence for troubled Jewish teenagers.

The JF&CS board of directors last week voted to shut the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre's residence, effective sometime in January.

Three of the home's five residents will be transferred to a Youthdale Treatment Centre, a Metro-wide string of eight homes which cater to troubled youth. One Diamond Centre resident is scheduled for discharge and the other is due to move to more independent living. Two of three teens who will be moved are Crown wards.

All future Jewish clients will be referred to Youthdale.

"We did all we could," said JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe. "It was a difficult, tough decision."

The fully kosher residence, just up the street from the centre's day programs, was built for six teens with behavioral and emotional problems and histories of abuse. It was staffed 24 hours a day, seven days a week, year-round.

The staff of seven will be laid off but, Wolfe noted, four of them will be rehired by Youthdale.

Wolfe said a formal agreement has been signed by JF&CS, Youthdale and the union representing the Diamond Centre staff.

Cutbacks

But critics of the closure say Youthdale in not a Jewish environment [CJN, Dec. 7] and closing the 20-year-old Diamond residence robs the community of a valuable service.

Both Youthdale and JF&CS "will do everything they can to maintain the Jewish holidays, respect Jewish culture and [keep] kashrut," Wolfe said.

It was last July's round of provincial budget cuts that prompted JF&CS to consider closing the residence, Wolfe added. In total, $400,000 has been cut from the agency's budget for 1996.

The residence's deficit was to be $20,000 for 1995-96 and forecast at up to $45,000 for the following year. The cost of caring for a single child was $250 a day.

But it's not all gloom, Wolfe pointed out. JF&CS' budget for the residence was $500,000 a year, of which $300,000 will now be returned to the government to allocate to Youthdale.

The remaining $200,000 will be used for mental health programs, more classes at the Diamond Centre's day program and an in-home treatment program.

No one from the Diamond Centre was available for comment last week.

In 1996

Looking towards 1996 we see a clouded Canadian horizon. The economy, the Constitution and national unity are unmistakably joined in a threatening formation approaching us slowly but certainly.

There is no doubt that the most important Canadian "issue" in the coming year, the one to which all others are inextricably tied, is the federalists' struggle against the separatists. Whether the upcoming year is "merely" a breather between last year's referendum and the Constitutional conference scheduled for 1997, or whether it becomes the occasion for the next referendum, strengthening the bonds within the country will be the top priority in the new year.

If Quebec separates, Canada ends. We have said this before. It must be stated over and over again, because some people are still missing the point. As former Ontario premier Bob Rae wrote last week in the Globe and Mail, "If Lucien Bouchard wins the next election and calls another referendum, we could well lose the country. Yet we seem incapable of sustaining that thought and appreciating its consequences for more than a few seconds ... The idea that we will try to muddle through with politics and business as usual is impossible."

Canadians had better sustain the thought soon. The future of the country is very much in doubt. We must therefore seek bold and imaginative solutions to dispel that doubt once and for all.

Unhelpful Manning

Last week in Ottawa, Preston Manning, leader of the federal Reform party, brought his party to a new low level of "leadership" in that vital aspect of governing we call parliamentary debate and public discourse. In response to the federal government's post-referendum initiatives, the leader of the Reform party resorted, yet again, to insulting ad hominem attacks against the prime minister.

The use of cheap studio theatrics, such as calling for the prime minister's impeachment, may make for amusing television clips, but that is not leadership. Resort to invective and aspersion may make for scathing sound bytes, but that too is not leadership.

One may legitimately disagree with the way in which the government has responded and is responding to the threat from the separatists. For the problem is complex; the separatist adversary appears unwilling to deal in good faith and the consequences of failure mean the break-up of the country. Ultimately, we expect the best approach to thwarting the separatists may prove to be a combination of approaches. Thus, in our view, the veto and distinct society bill is merely a statement of intentions and good will. It is not the conclusive remedy or the final balm. And the prime minister's purposeful ambiguity in response to the Reform's pointed, barbed questions, at this time, is constructive. It would be counter-productive, as demanded by Manning, for the government to spell out the full detail of its anti-separatist strategy at this time. But the manner of disagreement is as important as the reason for disagreement. The public's belief in the ability and credibility of the nation's institutions to solve our problems will depend to some extent on the way in which those institutions function, the way in which the leaders and the parties are willing to cooperate and jointly seek the answers which lie hidden somewhere in the undiscovered regions of good will and creativity.

"Politicians do not properly fulfil their function of educating, enlightening and setting an example for the public." These were the observations of Prof. Yehezkel Dror of Hebrew University in an exclusive interview to The CJN three weeks ago. Of course, he was speaking about politicians in general. But in our opinion, he could have been speaking about Preston Manning in particular.

At this historic juncture in the history of Canada, we expect – indeed we need – him to reach higher as a leader. We need him to be more helpful in the struggle against the separatists, to set an example of generosity of motive and civility of debate. A true leader would understand that.

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

On Dec. 23, 1900 the first Canadian Zionist convention was held in Montreal. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Israeli scholar stopped at border

Recently I was rejected from entering Canada at Windsor as a U.S. citizen and with an invitation to attend an academic conference at the University of Windsor. The passport officials were sure that I, also an Israeli, was trying to immigrate clandestinely into Canada. It was interesting that this was five days after the Jerusalem Post on Oct. 6 published my book review of Wendy Eisen's Count Us In, dealing with how the Canadian government and people had assisted in helping Soviet Jewry emigrate.

I can only deduce that Canada does not know how to treat its friends. Later, upon arriving in Toronto on Oct. 24, the night before I was to give a lecture to the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, I was pulled aside again, with a group of female retired Japanese tourists, to the Immigration office to interrogate us about our aims to immigrate to Canada. Of the dozens of countries throughout the world that I have visited, Canada is the only one that treats me this way.

Condolences from a non-Jew

You don't have to be Jewish to mourn Yitzhak Rabin any more than you have to be black to mourn Martin Luther King or Irish Catholic to mourn a Kennedy. It seems like a simple lesson to learn, but like most simple things, it comes the hard way.

How smug and self-satisfied a Canadian I have been to ignore a people who live with blood and bullets every day. Did we not all cry together when Rabin's granddaughter spoke of his caress? Or are we content to say this was the act of a lone madman?

This was not a lone act. I, and millions like me, contributed to this deed because of our lack of knowledge, empathy and support. Because we have failed to recognize the enemy within each of us as human beings.

To the Jewish people, I offer my condolences and an apology for having been silent for so long. It took the death of a peacemaker to make those who enjoy peace be accountable for letting others carry the burden. God bless us all.

93-year old mother in Meir photo

One of the women in the photo of Golda Meir on Mount Royal during a visit to Montreal in 1929 is my mother, Judith Oberman, now 93. The photo appeared Nov. 30 with an article by historian Gerald Tulchinsky. Oberman is in the centre behind Meir.

President of Spanish and Portuguese

Re "M. Edmond Elbaz Honoré par l'école Maimonides" (CJN, Nov. 30) I would like to advise that the president of the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue is Albert Bitton and not Selim Moghrabi. Mr. Moghrabi is a member of our congregation and an honorary president.

As a former Montrealer born and bred, I resent N. Ravel's remarks (CJN Dec. 7) "When a ship starts listing, the crew makes the best effort to repair the fault rather than jump overboard."

My family and I left Quebec when our rights were being abrogated: the right to speak any language of our choice; the right to educate our children in the school of our choice; and the right to a sign of our own choosing over the door of our business — which, incidentally, supported the province through our taxes.

We would not live in a "police state" anywhere in the world. Why should we stay in Montreal?

Don't link Rabin's murder with Judenrat

Emil Fackenheim's shamelessness knows no bounds. He admits to past errors, but "he was not alone." Now in "After Rabin's Murder" (CJN Dec. 7), he has the audacity to link Rabin's murder to the suicide of the head of Warsaw Ghetto's Judenrat.

The Judenrat was a puppet leadership, carrying out Nazi orders which ultimately lead to the destruction of the Jewish communities they were leaders of. Does Fackenheim suggest that Rabin also led Israelis towards similar destruction? Is he redrawing the infamously ugly picture of Israel's prime minister in SS uniform drawn by other hatemongers?

Seeking Jewish pilot's kin

I am trying to locate the family of a World War II Canadian airman, killed on a bombing raid on Salbris, France on May 8, 1944, Flying Officer Elmer Oscar Aaron. He lived in Philadelphia with his mother Mrs. Jeanne Aaron, later Herman. He had a sister who lived in Montreal, Mrs. Osias Pearlman.

Prying open the Kremlin's closed gates

(In June 1970, 16 Jews from Riga and Leningrad were arrested for plotting to commandeer an airplane to take them to Israel. Six months later, eleven of the defendants were "tried" in Leningrad on charges which included attempted treason. The other five were tried at a later date. The trial lasted seven days. All were convicted. On Dec. 24 they were sentenced. Two of the defendants, Eduard Kuznetsov and Mark Dymshitz, were sentenced to death. The other defendants received sentences varying from eight to fifteen years of "strict regime" in labor camps.

For many people in the west, the Leningrad "trial" was the incident which stirred their conscience and galvanized their support for Soviet Jews striving to become free. The CJN asked Kuznetsov to write about that terrible experience.)

Eduard Kuznetzov in 1985

By EDUARD KUZNETSOV

Twenty-five years ago, on Christmas Eve 1970, a sentence was pronounced at the regional court of Leningrad City: For attempting high treason — death penalties to Mark Dymshits and Eduard Kuznetsov. Ten other prisoners were given from four to 15 years imprisonment.

Why exactly on Christmas Eve? The calculation was simple: a Western consumer doesn't care about politics on those days; he's busy with shopping. But for some reason, the calculation didn't work this time. It turned out that the Western consumer sometimes manages to find time for both shopping and demonstrations.

It seems that the capitals of many Western countries had not witnessed demonstrations on such a scale before. Also, for the first time, heads of 19 Western states unanimously filed protests. But the most serious harm to the then head of the U.S.S.R., Leonid Brezhnev, was done by Francisco Franco, whose court on the same day sentenced three Basque terrorists to death for killing several gendarmes.

The demonstrations took place in Western Europe, using the slogan: "No to death sentences in U.S.S.R. and Spain!"

Franco gave in and put Breznev in a very awkward position, So awkward, that on New Year's Eve, members of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. were called from their festive tables in order to hold an urgent session and declare a repeal of the death sentences to Dymshits and myself.

That was the only night when I really was scared. Because suddenly, at about 11 p.m., when all the prison was asleep, four guards put manacles on me and dragged me to the office of the prison director. Why are you taken at night? Especialy New Year's night? Clearly, it's to be shot.

At that moment I was obsessed by only one thought: "Don't show that I'm scared."

The death penalties to Dymshits and myself were commuted to 15 years imprisonment.

* * *

In 1968, after serving a seven-year prison term for underground anti-Soviet activities, I tried to emigrate to Israel legally. But in those years, it was practically impossible to even get the documents necessary for submitting the application to emigrate — to say nothing of emigration itself.

This is why we — a group of Zionists from Riga, Leningrad, Kishinev and Odessa — began to discuss plans for illegal emigration — i.e., escape.

Very soon we came to the conclusion that the preparation for such an act — taking into consideration the number of participants — would not go unnoticed by the KGB. We therefore had to orient ourselves not to escaping, but to making it known that our arrests were scandalous — in order to draw Western attention to the problem of the closed Soviet state.

What could be more scandalous than a hijacking? Especially in those years, when all the world was continually being shocked by each bloody hijacking drama. But first of all we planned our hijacking to eliminate any bloodshed. (We had bought up all the tickets for the plane and had our pilot — Dymshits.) And secondly, we understood that in reality we had to be arrested before we climbed aboard the plane.

But the hijacking attempt itself had to demonstrate the full measure of our despair — despair over the impossibility of leaving the country, where they put you in prison for studying Hebrew, as well as to show our desire to say goodbye to "the large prison," which was what many of us called the former Soviet Union at that time.

I have to say that we succeeded. Succeeded so well that four years later a general of the KGB (who refused to identify himself) said to me: " 'If we had known that everything would go in such a way, we'd have been better to give you the opportunity to escape.'

"Then we'd have been no more than hijackers and they would not have been forced to give in to Western pressure and let out tens of thousands of Jews."

It was true. By means of mass arrests (in all 49 people were put in jail in connection with our case), the Soviet authorities hoped to intimidate Soviet Jewry and completely destroy the movement for emigration to Israel. But Soviet Jewry was not frightened. Not because they were such big heroes, but mainly because they were encouraged by the strong support of Western Jewry.

So, as the result of waves of protest in the West and the series of Jewish demonstrations inside the USSR itself, the Kremlin was forced to open its gates — and for the first time since the '20s, tens of thousands of people managed to leave Russia.

But there was also a more important result of the "Leningrad trial" and the demonstrations in the West: For the first time, the world saw with its own eyes that the Kremlin's notorious obstinacy was a myth. The Kremlin, like all dictatorial regimes, gave in if the pressure was prolonged and really strong. * * *

In 1979, Dymshits and I were released in exchange for two Soviet spies arrested in the United States.

This New Year's Eve, Dymshits and I will mark a quarter of a century of our second life. But it was not a gift given to us by the humanity of Moscow. It was a result of the tough position of the West, which loudly and very seriously demanded a liberal emigration policy and the repeal of the death sentences for Dymshitz and me.

One of the individuals who embodied the struggle of Soviet Jewry was Natan Sharansky. Arrested in March 1977, he was falsely accused, "tried" and convicted of being a western spy. He spent nine years in the Soviet gulag, eventually gaining his freedom in February 1986.

The CJN spoke with Sharansky at his home in Jerusalem to obtain his reflections on the significance of the Leningrad trials.

CJN: How did you feel when you heard the news?

Sharansky: I remember my feelings very well. The arrest itself was not made public. But the trial and the results were published in Izvestia and Pravda. They were very big articles which spoke about a Zionist plot against the sovereignty and independence of the Soviet Union. Enemies of the Soviet Union, western provocateurs, they said, were plotting to kill Soviet citizens.

The first reaction was fear. We thought it was a signal for a new anti-Jewish campaign. The trial was accompanied by a big propaganda campaign.

But then we felt a second response. The fearful thoughts that many of us had for our personal situations seemed less and less important, when we realized that there were such courageous people who were ready to risk their lives to reach Israel. How could we be afraid when we were risking mainly our jobs?

As it turned out, the whole scheme by the KGB proved to be a big mistake. The courage of the prisoners sent a powerful message to the Jews of the Soviet Union. More and more started to listen to the Voice of America. Therefore, the Soviet propaganda campaign had the opposite effect.

When the court sentenced them to death, we saw this as a very bad sign. But, ultimately public opinion changed the sentence. The struggle became immediately transformed. It was now not only a struggle of the Jews of the Soviet Union alone, but of the Jews from around the world. The Jews from around the world gave hope to the Jews in the Soviet Union. And as history proved, the combined struggle bore fruit.

CJN: Was the Leningrad trial one of the key events in the struggle?

Sharansky: The first event which turned our faces to Zion was the Six Day War. In a real sense, this was the beginning. But on practical grounds, in terms of bringing energy to our struggle, in terms of thinking seriously about what we faced, in terms of showing courage and in terms of showing us that we had allies all around the world, the trial, undoubtedly, was the most important event.

CJN: Twenty-five years after the trial and nearly10 years after your own freedom, what should we teach the young generation growing up not knowing about the struggle?

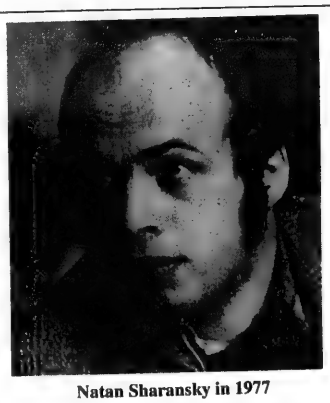
Sharansky: We should teach them that communism was very tragic and yet yielded a very positive result. It was tragic because tens of millions of people became its victims. Communism forced people to live without freedom, without religion and without property. It kept people in fear. And yet it was brought down. This was the positive result. It showed that the spark within human nature can't be changed, can't be suppressed forever.

CJN: What was the wider impact of the Soviet Jewry struggle on the Soviet Union?

Sharansky: The "virus" of freedom was kept alive by the Jews and the refuseniks, and by the dissidents too, of course. The Jews played a great role in defeating communism.

CJN: And on other Jews of the Soviet Union?

Sharansky: It made many Jews who had absolutely no desire to be Jewish and certainly no knowledge about being Jewish turn toward a new identity. They soon discovered they could be proud and respected as Jews by non-Jews. This was truly the beginning of the return of Jews back to their Jewishness.



Natan Sharansky in 1977

CJN: What are your conclusions about the relationship between the actions of individuals and the flow of history?

Sharansky: The history of people who participate in the flow of history is really the history of people of free will. The return to one's Jewish roots meant becoming a free person. When you become a free person, you become so strong that even in prison, you feel that your oppressors cannot harm you. You feel that you are influencing people and events. It is a unique feeling.

The future of the Jewish people depends on the future of the State of Israel. Israel must now be our focus. The energy and the sense of strength within the Jewish people which we felt in the struggle for Soviet Jewry must now be rechannelled worldwide among our people into making Israel a place which will be able to attract Jews for the sake of the quality of the life they can live in Israel.

There is no doubt that individuals can affect history. Kuznetsov is a good example. He behaved with such amazing dignity. He wrote a book in prison and succeeded in sending it abroad. This is a feat which takes a lot of energy, planning and brains. This was an unimaginable heroic act, almost not repeatable.

Editor's note. The following detail describes Kuznetsov's determination and courage. It is excerpted from Count Us In, The Struggle to Free Soviet Jews, A Canadian Perspective, by Wendy Eisen, Burgher Books 1995.

" 'To survive in a Soviet prison, one has to struggle. Writing was my struggle.' He explained how he bribed the guards with chewing gum to get the onion-skin paper required for his writing. Since prisoners were permitted to write only postcards, he tore the thin paper into 8x13-centimetre pieces. Each day, he would place a piece of the paper, which fit on a postcard, and with fine-tipped indelible pen, would record his feelings and daily activities in handwriting so small it could only be read with a magnifying glass.

"Kuznetsov frequently swallowed the single sheet of paper rather than be caught writing a daily diary. Every evening, he added the page written that day to the others buried in the earth in his cell. On the day of his release, Kuznetsov dug up his prison diary and swallowed it, page by page. The 200 pages formed a one-inch thick stack of sheets. Pointing to them, he said, 'Each one of these pages has been digested two or three times.' "

Today Eduard Kuznetsov lives in Israel. He is the editor of Vesty, a Russian-language newspaper.

Chanukah hu chag tov

Santa's not coming this year.

Well, it's not like he's come before, but this year during the last few weeks of school I've eaten so many candy canes and so much gingerbread and Christmas goodies, that I thought he might drop in. Some of my friends have tried to persuade me that Santa's not real. I know the truth. I've already seen him in the shopping mall. They say it's their parents who buy them presents and write Santa's name on the card. I know they're wrong because in 20 years I have never received a present from my parents, signing their name as Santa.

By Viva Press

He just skips my house, that's all. Umm ... okay ... maybe not. Maybe it's because I'm Jewish that Santa doesn't visit me. I can live with that. If anything, I'd much rather have no visit than a visit by a commercialized fictitious Jewish equivalent.

It's not that I'm jealous of my friends who have lists of things they want. In fact, I think it's these lists themselves that are at the root of a very big problem. I believe it's the commercialism that makes Christmas less a religious holiday and more a secular one. And in turn, Chanukah, which would normally be a significant but low-key holiday, is blown way out of proportion by association with the Christmas festivities.

What I despise most is the parallel drawn between Chanukah and the Christmas season. They sometimes coincide. And that's where their similarities end.

Well, that's where the similarities end for me. But Chanukah has been so sucked in to the consumerism rampant at Christmas time that it now competes with its Christian counterpart. Chanukah bushes come with lights and gifts.

My cousin, whose children attend Jewish day schools, told me that parents she knows are telling their kids not to envy the Christmas bounty since Chanukah offers more: Chanukah has eight days in which to get presents, whereas Christmas has only one day. I think there is something wrong here.

If Chanukah were in July, it would not command the hype it now receives. Instead, it would be celebrated as the holiday when the outnumbered Jews, led by the Maccabees, overcame the powerful Syrians and returned the Temple to its rightful owners.

Chanukah is one of the happiest Jewish holidays and small gifts are sometimes given to children at candlelighting time. And here is where the problem arises. The term "small gift" is what is targeted by manufacturers. This is how the miracle that Chanukah celebrates is forgotten.

Ironically, Chanukah is more widely celebrated than some of the holidays inscribed in the Torah, like Shavuot for example. The time of the giving of our Torah, is much more important to the Jewish people than Chanukah, yet takes a back seat when it comes to its observance. In the Diaspora, at least.

I look forward to Chanukah, not for the small gifts I may get, but for what the holiday itself stands for. I don't need Santa; the Maccabees are way cooler. They lit the menorah in the Temple with oil that was supposed to last for just one day, but instead this oil burned an unprecedented eight days. It was a miracle that the Jews overcame their enemies and that the oil lasted so long. This calls for a celebration.

Chanukah means yummy latkes and sufganiot, dreidel games and gelt, and best of all, picking the colors of the candles for the Chanukiah. It's a family holiday.

This year I'm glad I finished my exams early so that I can spend Chanukah with my family in Toronto. It's not that I had a bad time last year with my friends in Halifax, but for me Chanukah is associated with my family.

We wolf down greasy latkes with homemade applesauce as quickly as possible so that my siblings and I can show our parents who rules in dreidel games. The dreidel's inscribed letters remind us that a "great miracle happened there."

When we were younger, my parents may have let us win the dreidel spinoffs or the gambling, but they have no such luck now that we are older. If I remember correctly, my parents lose every year. (And this includes the extra bag of gelt they use after they have lost all of their coins.) This is what Chanukah is about.

But isn't this what Christmas is also supposed to be about? It too is a family holiday and a celebration of an important event in Christianity. Unfortunately, the true meaning of this holiday and all holidays, such as Chanukah, that fall within this time frame, have been usurped by the two "Cs": commercialism and consumerism.

So it is up to us to keep our traditions stronger than the existing pressures to equate Chanukah with the over-spending that takes place during the Christmas season. We sing, "sevivon sov sov sov, Chanukah hu chag tov." Yes, Chanukah hu chag tov.

Happy Chanukah.

It's about time

It's astonishing how in the tempo of latter 20th century living we rush time. In and out: one year, one decade, one century, one millennium. Quick and simple.

By Jack Chisvin

Only halfway through the 1990s, editorialists everywhere are already writing about the 21st century. It is almost made to appear that the next five years won't exist. The leap-frogging of time tends to ignore what is good in the world today and inculcates an unnecessarily dispirited image. It magnifies fleeting fads into movements of great importance and generates a false sense of excitement.

When prehistoric humans began to connect changing seasons and regularity of nature with a universal order, the concept of time was born, and they were forever enslaved to the tyranny of the clock. Through the ages, dealing with time became a major preoccupation of humanity. The great monoliths at Stonehenge, the early Egyptians' simple sun dials, the carved steles of the Maya are monuments to ancient cultures' obsession with time.

Today devices for measuring and recording time are everywhere. We place them on walls; we mount them on buildings; we erect them in public streets; we build them into all manner of utilitarian things; and mostly we wear them on our wrists as comforting magic amulets. We also sound chimes, ring bells and blow shofars to announce or celebrate the passing of time, to see events unfold and to shepherd our affairs.

In a sense, time is an adversary and all achievements of civilization are victories in the struggle with time. Modern technological society could not exist without the dimension of time. Velocity, acceleration, power, energy are all functions of time. Life itself is a measure of time: "so teach us to number our days," and we do, recording the time of birth, tracking birthdays and finally entering the time of death.

We have become compulsive about saving time. Where once upon a more leisurely time, I would allow 15 minutes to get to an appointment, I found I could save time with a 14-minute headstart, then 13, then 12, then ... Before long I was operating on Jewish time — hoarding the saved minutes in my time bank.

Saving time is not something that you adopt, it slowly creeps upon you through the years. But saving time defies logic for what can you do with saved minutes and hours accumulated over a lifetime. Most things worth saving appreciate in value, but there is no market for unspent time. When the end comes there is no timekeeper to account for time saved and add it at the finish to lengthen your span in this world.

Time is a precious gift too often not appreciated and almost always taken for granted. Paradoxically, while on one hand we save time on the other hand we "kill time," an expression that is more profound and terrifying than may appear. Uneasy in the presence of what is really worthwhile we escape, we "kill" the brief time of our lives by plunging into a whirl of vacuous activity.

From Chassidic wisdom we learn: "And if not now, when? When will the 'now' be? The now that is now, this moment, never existed before — from the time the world was created — and this moment will never exist again. Formerly there was another 'now' and later there will be another 'now' and every 'now' has its own special import and function."

Let's live the 'now.' Let's slow down a little, and postpone melancholy visitations to the future which are apt to leave us with sagging spirits. Let's laugh and celebrate beauty, elegance and what's contemporary. And let's even stop to usher in the new year with funny hats and splashing bubbly.

But when the party is over let's remember that time is irretrievable. There is no one, who at some moment or other has not felt a desperate need for more time. Often a minute or even a few seconds can be the difference between win and loss, success and failure, even life and death. We all experience the urge to recapture time before it becomes part of eternity.

The best known quote from scriptures is about time. "To everything there is a season and a time to every purpose under the heaven" — Ecclesiastes. To be ready is much, to have the patience to wait is more, but to recognize the right moment is everything. With that sentiment, it's about time I turn this column over to someone else.

Early Canada included Jews

In their drive for sovereignty, Quebecers have had recourse to a basic assumption — that there were two founding peoples, the French and the English.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Now comes a new book which shows that the history of the land was not that simple, that in fact there were a good many others who helped to build it. Amongst these were of course the indigenous native people, blacks, and last but not least Jews, all of whom were counted as races or peoples but were not considered either English or French.

This insight is not altogether new, but never has it been as cogently and carefully shown as in a new book entitled Search Out The Land. Written by Sheldon and Judith Godfrey, who have proven their historical expertise in their previous writing, it focuses on the Jews and the growth of equality in British North America between the years 1740 and 1867.

I found the book altogether engrossing, well-written, meticulously researched and filled with an enormous array of fascinating detail.

In the opening chapter, The Search Begins, the authors write:

"Most of those writing on the early history of Canada have assumed that there were very few Jews in Canada in the first years of British control and settlement and that consequently Jews had virtually no impact on the country's early development ... The few previous studies of Jews in this period of Canadian history have left most of us with the belief that the larger Jewish community which arrived in Canada after 1880 was somewhat grafted onto a country founded by non-Jews, a country in which the Jewish presence had hitherto made no impact. Yet this is not the case. Official British and Colonial records do not adequately reflect the role played by racial and religious minorities, women, blacks, aboriginal peoples and immigrants from the Far East and other lands. All were here in numbers, many from the earliest period of Canada's development. This fact alone should cast doubt on the more recent idea of "two founding peoples."

Among the many things I garnered from this book is also the difference between "British North America," which broadly designates today's Canada, and the "Thirteen Colonies," which after 1776 became the United States of America. I had been under the mistaken impression that before 1776, all of British owned and governed North America lived by the same rules and precedents. But that was not so.

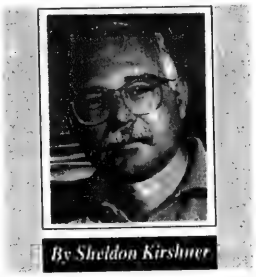
Thus, legal residence was acquired by Jews in New York from 1654 on, while in British North America that permission was not granted until 100 years later. (In fact, New York antedates the extension of this right in England itself.) Again, Jews were allowed to swear on the Chumash in Rhode Island from 1658 on, in England from 1680 on, and in British North America (Nova Scotia) only from 1752 on.

The book is filled with stories of this kind and tells the tales of many families and individuals — characters that should be much better known than has hitherto been the case.

I congratulate the Godfreys on their splendid achievement, which combines careful research with an eye for the unusual and tells its story engagingly.

The Kirshner File

Transformation of PLO driven by reality



By Sheldon Kirshner

Once the bitterest of enemies, Israel and the PLO are now partners in peacemaking. The metamorphosis, an historic watershed, was gradual and perhaps inevitable. But the question remains: why did the PLO choose the path of accommodation rather than that of armed struggle?

The answers are found in Barry Rubin's Revolution Until Victory? The Politics and History of the PLO (Harvard University Press, $24.95 US), an impressive analysis of that Palestinian umbrella group. A fine companion volume by F. Robert Hunter, The Palestinian Uprising (University of California Press, $15 US), explains why the intifadah — a factor in the peace process — erupted.

For more than a decade after its founding in the mid-1960s, the PLO hewed to an uncompromising vision of Israel as an artificial colonial entity whose collapse was preordained. Believing that Israel was not a "real" nation, PLO ideologues argued that a steady campaign of terrorism would trigger its disintegration.

Not all Palestinians, of course, subscribed to that one-dimensional view. By the later 1970s, an increasing number of PLO leaders and Palestinians in the territories had realized that Israel could not be destroyed and that revolutionary rhetoric had brought little gain, writes Rubin.

Yet as long as these realists were outnumbered by radicals, the PLO was unable to transform itself and develop a serious peace policy. In 1988, when PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat finally recognized Israel's existence, the PLO embarked on the road toward a diplomatic solution. But Israel was still not ready to deal directly with the PLO. Five years would elapse before Israel summoned up the courage to do that, and then, only clandestinely.

The transformation of the PLO into an organization capable of negotiating with Israel was driven by reality. Terrorism had not "liberated" one inch of territory, and the intifadah — while highlighting the Palestinian problem and isolating Israel — had ravaged the economies of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, observes Rubin.

Initially, as Hunter notes, the intifadah was a statement of Palestinian discontent and rejection of occupation. Later, however, Palestinian political objectives were defined.

The revolt, which broke out in 1987, represented an important shift in the balance of Palestinian politics. Before the intifadah, the focus of the PLO had been on Palestinians who lived in the Diaspora. Afterward, the concerns of the Palestinians in the territories became of paramount importance to the PLO elite based in Tunis. At around the same time, the PLO, bowing to U.S., Soviet and Egyptian pressure, began to moderate its policies toward Israel.

As part of this process, the PLO was forced to reassess its skewed picture of Israel, says Rubin. The PLO had been inclined to separate Israel from any Jewish historical, national or philosophical context. And rather than seeing Zionism as a Jewish nationalistic movement, it was defined as imperialist, racist and aggressive. In the words of one of its spokesman, Israel was "an alien entity in the region ... moving against the historical trend." As late as 1988, Arafat himself declared: "We are going with the course of history, and they are going against it."

The tide of events proved Arafat wrong. The PLO's pro-Iraqi position during the 1990-91 Kuwait crisis backfired, antagonizing not only Arab financial backers (notably Saudi Arabia) and the United States, but alienating patrons like Egypt. By supporting Saddam Hussein, Arafat repeated old Palestinian mistakes: subordinating the PLO's future to Arab leaders and betting on a military rather than a political option.

The demise of the Soviet Union was also a blow. In one stroke, the PLO lost a superpower advocate which had provided political, economic and military assistance.

By 1992, the year Israel's Labor party won re-election, the PLO had been weakened considerably, though it still remained a key player in the Arab-Israeli bilateral talks which had begun in Madrid in 1991.

Yasser Arafat

As Rubin suggests, the deadlock in those negotiations gave Israel and the PLO an incentive to conduct secret negotiations in Norway.

Both sides were looking for a breakthrough. Arafat needed progress to solve the PLO's growing financial problems, squelch the mounting criticism of his stewardship and deal with the ascendancy of his Islamic fundamentalist rivals, principally Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

In addition, Arafat wanted to seize control of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip from Palestinian leaders there whom he didn't entirely trust.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin set the stage for direct talks with the PLO by decriminalizing meetings with their representatives. Having done this, and having reached the conclusion that Palestinians in the territories could not deliver the goods, he decided he had no alternative but to negotiate with the PLO.

Since then, Arafat's conciliatory policies have precipitated opposition from PLO loyalists. No one should be surprised by this development. The PLO, as Rubin clearly points out, is a divided house, representing diverse interests by virtue of the fact that the Palestinians are a scattered people.

Those whom fate turned into refugees in 1948 are usually the most extreme with respect to their attitude toward Israel. For them to regain their former homes requires Israel's destruction.

In opposing the Oslo accords, the extremists cite the following arguments. The first is that Israel has no intrinsic right to exist, since it is a betrayal of their yearning for a Palestinian state running from Jordan to the Mediterranean Sea. The second is that the 1948 refugees receive almost nothing immediately from the agreement. The third is that Arafat has given up on creating a Palestinian state, and resigned himself to limited autonomy.

Such critics forget that, for all its shortcomings, the Oslo agreement was the best the PLO could salvage under the circumstances. They also forget that the PLO has come to grief as a result of its reliance on Arab states.

Although they have doubtless helped the Palestinians in the past, Arab countries, as Rubin notes, have always pursued their own interests, often to the detriment of the PLO.

Arab states, particularly Syria, have manipulated and interfered with the PLO. For almost two decades after 1948, the Palestinians accepted Arab domination of their agenda in the belief that Arab unity would sweep away Israel. But with the bankruptcy of that formula, the PLO came to its senses, altered its priorities and started direct negotiations with Israel.

Where it will all lead no one knows.

ISRAEL AFTER THE ASSASSINATION

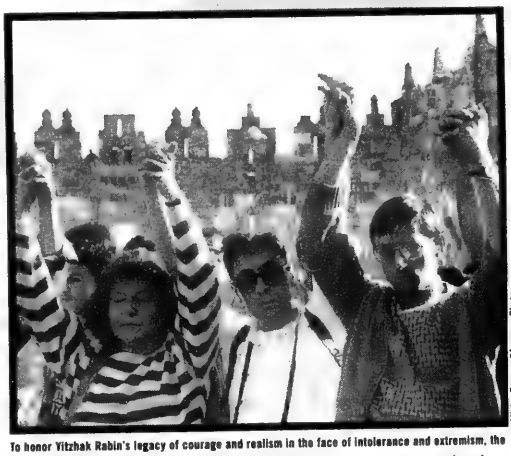
The Real Threats to Israel: Intolerance & Extremism

The murder of Israel's Prime Minister has forced Israel and the Jewish world to ask: "Where did we go wrong?" What killed Yitzhak Rabin was not merely the act of one fanatic. The assassin's evil deed was spawned in a climate of hatred and violent incitement over the peace process, while good people on both sides of the debate did almost nothing to stop it. This tragedy has exposed a long-festering wound in Israeli society. What can we do to help?

In the tradition of "tikkun olam", the New Israel Fund was founded in 1979 to confront the very problems the assassination has brought to the fore: intolerance, incivility, the rise of anti-democratic forces. For the past 16 years, we have been the principal supporter of a network of over 200 non-governmental organizations in Israel that promote democratic values and respect for human rights, religious pluralism and tolerance, Jewish-Arab coexistence, and women's equality.

Some have preferred to ignore these challenges. Others said they were luxuries that must await peace. Today it is clear that the future of Israeli democracy depends on these efforts.

To truly honor the memory of Yitzhak Rabin, we must intensify the struggle against the forces that killed him. The New Israel Fund is therefore launching a Campaign for Tolerance, Dialogue and Democracy. With our financial support and encouragement, Israeli organizations will wage the Campaign on three fronts:



Micha Bar-am/Magnum Photos

To honor Yitzhak Rabin's legacy of courage and realism in the face of intolerance and extremism, the New Israel Fund's Campaign for Tolerance, Dialogue and Democracy will promote progressive values rooted in the Jewish tradition: human rights, social justice, pluralism and tolerance.

Educating for democracy
Developing awareness at all levels of society that, beyond laws and political institutions, true democracy requires civil discourse and unwavering commitment to human rights and the rule of law.

Widening channels for dialogue
Creating new opportunities for reasoned discourse between politically and religiously polarized groups: right and left, Orthodox and secular, hard-line nationalists and advocates of compromise.

Ensuring Israel's rule of law
Holding the government accountable for enforcing prohibitions against incitement and political violence, while safeguarding civil liberties.

Peace and democracy are not created only by diplomats or politicians but equally by men, women, and children building, over many years, the habits and institutions of civil society. Israeli democracy must be more deeply rooted in civic life, so that young Israelis will grow up to value dialogue over diatribe, tolerance over violence. This is the new Israel we are working to build. Join us.

Lubavitch women to meet

TORONTO — Women from across North America are expected to attend the 34th International Midwinter Women's Convention of the Lubavitch Women's League, to be held Jan. 12 to 14, 1996 at the Chimo Hotel, at Woodbine and Steeles avenues.

Speakers, seminars and symposiums will deal with the theme Today's Woman for a Better Tomorrow.

Nutrition, relationships and maintaining values in an ever-changing society will be among the topics discussed.

Speakers will include Mashi Lipskar, dean of the Women's Hebrew College of Johannesburg, South Africa, and Esther Wachsman, whose son, Nachshon was murdered by Arab terrorists.

The midwinter convention was held in Toronto in 1976 and 1987.

Lubavitch Women's League was established in 1951 by the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. It now has chapters throughout the world.

For more information, call Esther Grossbaum, convention coordinator, 905-731-7000.

Music program thriving

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Music is one of the best ways to teach, maintains Adele Gertner. So strong is her belief that she has begun a Jewish music program for children of all ages.

Between 30 and 50 children have been coming every week to B'nai Brith Canada headquarters on Hove Street in Downsview to learn Jewish and Israeli music. Gertner hopes that in the next session, beginning Jan. 7, more children, especially teenagers, will come, so that she can have programs divided by age.

Most of the participants, she told The CJN, don't go to Hebrew school, but "after three weeks or so, they catch on. I love kids — they are incredible with the questions they ask and their interpretations."

Most of the songs are in the folk category, but "we do a bit of everything — Zionist, Israeli, Jewish, traditional."

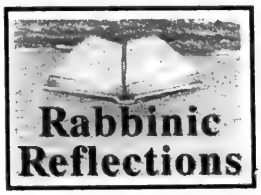
She hopes in the next term to add more about holidays.

The hour and a half sessions are not exclusively singing — Gertner includes some folkdancing and movies in the program.

Sponsors of the music program are B'nai Brith, the Canadian Zionist Federation and Jewish National Fund. Cost is $1 per session.

For more information, call 416-633-3988.

Time to find a new road



By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

One of the most painful features of the rhetoric following the tragic death of Yitzhak Rabin at the hands of a Jewish assassin is the intellectual credibility given to the so-called rodef argument, the contention that anyone involved in giving away land and thereby endangering lives is a pursuer whom one is permitted to kill. That we should even be debating the merits of this argument is sorely disquieting.

There is more than ample room to seriously question the peace strategy and the details of the proposed agreement, be it Oslo 1, Oslo 2 or Oslo whatever. But it makes no more sense to brand the architects of Oslo as pursuers than it does to label their opponents as pursuers because by not agreeing to the peace package, Israel will be forced to go to war and that will cause many casualties. No one has argued in that way, because it is absurd. The allegation that the Oslo proponents are pursuers is equally absurd.

In the end, we are all complicit in what happened. It is, in a way, collective guilt, as in collective responsibility. We may not have been directly involved in the craziness, but we may not have protested this craziness with sufficient resolve. We may have believed that it was only a fringe which would never infiltrate into the mainstream community; that they would never do anything that would be so devastating to the community.

How wrong we were. And how wrong we will continue to be, if we simply sit by and let these fulminations go without comment and without denunciation.

Is the responsibility for the present climate all one-sided? Is it only the Torah-based community that must do the soul-searching?

On the extremist front, the extreme left, as far as I know, has not recommended killing others. That is not the case with the extreme right. On the killing front, the responsibility is one-sided.

But extremes, though a part of the community structure, do not represent the mainstream. The challenge of the mainstream is to take off the kid gloves and to introduce what may be described as the passion of moderation and the general consensus that derives therefrom.

This will be achieved not by hectoring, not by finger pointing, not by name calling, but by humbly looking inward. Secularists as well as religionists must establish a new base of dialogue, via the realization that we are all part of a family, a large family, but a family nonetheless, and ever so fragile.

In reality, secularists as well as religionists are responsible for the divisions within the community. There are too many secularists who harbor a venomous hatred of the Jewish religion and of religious Jews. And there are too many religious Jews who feel similarly about the secularists. How many is "too many"? One is too many.

Rabin's assassination let the hatred genie out of the bottle. Previously it was imprudent, and not politically correct, to openly attack religious Jews just because they were religious. Now, in the post-assassination climate, it is open season on religious Jews, and political correctness now works in reverse. It is politically correct to attack religious Jews. As politically correct as it may be, it is also socially destructive.

Blame gets us nowhere and only drags us further into the deep hole we are in. Collective blame, collective guilt, must be parleyed into collective responsibility for the future of our Jewish community, in Israel and abroad. It means taking the road of pleasantness (noam), shirking stereotypes and searching for the souls of others. It means focusing on our commonalities and building upon them. It means stretching out the hand of harmony to all members of the family of Israel.

This is a critical time in our history. We can continue down the precipice or we can grab ourselves by our historical and spiritual roots and forge a togetherness that transcends differences. What is at stake is nothing less that Israel's viability and Judaism's future.

Rabin in his lifetime said many times that you do not make peace with your friends, you make peace with your enemies. On the other side of the equation, very often the most bitter enemies can be the ones who were previously friends, even family.

This has happened more than once in Jewish history, with devastating consequences. Woe to us if it should happen again.

Rabbi Bulka is the spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.

'Buzz of excitement' prevails at Israel Fair

TORONTO — It was Sunday shopping with an Israeli flavor.

Hundreds turned out recently for the second annual Israel Sunday sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. Twenty-four organizations — nine more than the year before — from Israeli universities to stamp collectors, set up displays at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The exhibitors themselves helped to plan this year's Israel fair, creating what committee chair Lorraine Sandler called "a buzz of excitement."

The university booths were especially busy. Representatives from Tel Aviv University, Bar-Ilan and Hebrew U tried to persuade prospective students to enrol. Despite the controversy surrounding Bar-Ilan because Yitzhak Rabin's alleged assassin, Yigal Amir, was a student there, university spokesperson Ronen Goldstein said the level of interest seems to be the same as last year.

Sandler said she hopes that Israel Sunday will encourage teenagers and young adults to consider a trip to Israel a rite of passage.

"This is a major Jewish continuity initiative," she said.

Her committee is looking at bringing youth leaders from Israel to train their Canadian counterparts, creating a database with the names of everyone who participates in an Israel experience program. They hope to organize another Israel Sunday in February or March.

Outsmarting Pharaoh

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

We begin reading the book of Exodus this month; in it, the story of Israel's plight in Egypt unfolds. The characters of Pharaoh, Moses, Aaron and Miriam are well known, but there are many secondary people presented in the Bible who are often overlooked.

The first chapter tells of Pharaoh's intent to destroy the Jews by ordering the Jewish midwives to kill all the newborn baby boys. These midwives, Shifra and Puah, manage to outwit the great Pharaoh and save countless lives, just as Moses' mother, Yochevet, manages to save Moses, ultimately saving the entire nation.

These tremendous acts are worthy of a close reading to understand how they were accomplished.

Pharaoh orders the midwives to kill all the baby boys. They refuse to do so and tell Pharaoh that the Jewish women are not like human woman but like animals and they deliver before the midwives arrive. Pharaoh clearly accepts this response, since the midwives are not punished.

These women understand that Pharaoh's prejudiced views will allow him to believe such a statement. Only by viewing Jewish women as sub-human could he have accepted the argument that they breed like animals.

Shifra and Puah have found the one excuse that would appear plausible to the king. However, Pharaoh is extremely cunning and now orders that all baby boys be thrown into the Nile.

It is important to note that in ancient Egypt the Nile was viewed as a god. Thus Pharaoh has changed what was originally a murderous edict into a religious rite. Killing a newborn baby for no reason is difficult, but sacrificing an innocent baby to an ancient god could be considered a good thing.

Now, even if the women did breed like animals, the babies could still be cast into the Nile as a religious tribute.

Then Yochevet, Moses' mother, takes over. When Moses is born, his mother hides him for as long as she can. Once it becomes impossible to continue hiding him, she fashions a small craft, which she waterproofs with tar.

Yochevet then places the infant into the craft and sets it on the Nile. In other words, she has complied with the letter of the law. Pharaoh had stated that all baby boys must be cast into the Nile and Yochevet has cast her son into the river.

Moses is ultimately saved and grows to adulthood. It is he who returns to Egypt as God's spokesman and demands Israel's release from slavery.

The story of the Exodus is dominated by strong and powerful characters. Yet none of the events could have taken place had it not been for the often forgotten actions of a handful of women. By understanding the authority of the land, the midwives were able to appease both Pharaoh and their moral consciences. Likewise, Yochevet manages to manoeuvre within what appears to be an air-tight edict.

These women play out their roles subtly, almost silently, but they lay the foundation for one of the greatest events in Jewish history.

Rational vocabulary required to avoid a gloomy future

By MICHAEL LESHER
Special to The CJN

"Kill them all!" When you hear those words from the back of a synagogue, you don't forget them.

Guest Voices

Up front, the rabbi had just made a cautious appeal for calm in Israel.

The heckler doubled his volume: "Kill the Arabs! Baruch Goldstein is a Jewish hero!"

This was over a year ago. In Israel, a tortuous road toward an Israeli-Palestinian accord had just opened and Goldstein had gunned down Arabs in a Hebron mosque.

And recently I read that rabbis had encouraged a rebellion among soldiers who, as part of a possible peace accord, may be called upon to withdraw Jewish residents from West Bank settlements.

Again in the synagogue I hear mutterings about civil war, the glory of martyrdom and the government's betrayal.

How has this happened to us?

True, a fundamentalist uprising against the Seleucid empire 2,100 years ago is at the heart of our Chanukah festival. But rabbinic Judaism has for centuries steadily pushed the violent side of such victories well into the background.

Ironically, with the establishment of the State of Israel, a violent martyrology, which had germinated for two milennia, suddenly found itself transplanted to the fertile soil of a rearmed Zion in the unlikely figure of Baruch Goldstein.

His massacre — right down to the choice of victims, the site (one of the "holy cities" of ancient Judea), even the Israeli uniform he wore was an ugly hybrid of religious extremism and nationalist fantasy. Unfortunately, it had a certain appeal. Set against the painful compromise of the Oslo accords and viewed by some as saintly, his act seemed noble. Hadn't he sacrificed himself to stop the "peace process" that was gnawing at the vitals of the Holy Land?

Actually, no. Precedent was clearly against such a view. Orthodox rabbis offered no military advice on the eve of Israel's War of Independence. Israel's rabbinate did not press for the capture of Old Jerusalem (to say nothing of Hebron or Shechem) during the 19 years the West Bank was under Jordanian rule.

But even while rabbinic leaders in and out of Israel were condemning Goldstein's act, extremists began streaming to his grave. Soon, the spicy stew of nationalism, martyr-worship and extremism proved impossible for some rabbis to resist. In service of the Goldstein legend, and not as defender of tradition, former chief rabbi Avraham Shapira issued his notorious ruling that Orthodox soldiers might refuse to obey orders which ostensibly violate the Torah.

Such a radical posture is not typical of traditional Judaism, past or present. But the extremists' hands are strengthened by the release of long-suppressed passions which have boiled up with sudden force. Typical was a blast from Rabbi Shlomo Riskin of Efrat: "If Oslo II is signed, giving away all of Judea and Samaria except for the settlements, it will lead to a PLO state ... and that will lead to our destruction."

A statement like that amounts to tossing matches at a powder keg. The intricacies of national security are vexing enough for the government's leaders, who must reckon with the consequences of their judgments. They are not helped by obstructionists whose only responsibility is to an abstract credo. Whatever happens, it will be the maligned Israeli government and the weakened Israeli army that will have to bear the weight of the nation's policy.

Of course, the Israeli government's peace plan may not work. But what will certainly not work is precisely what the fundamentalists offer: loud demands divorced from rational politics and messianism in a moral vacuum.

Crudity breeds crudity, and a religious consensus built on a mass murder could only be an ignoble one. Yet that is where we may be heading if Jews cannot find a more rational vocabulary.

"Kill them all!" would be a gloomy epitaph for the renascence of modern Jewish culture.

Peace group facing its stiffest test yet

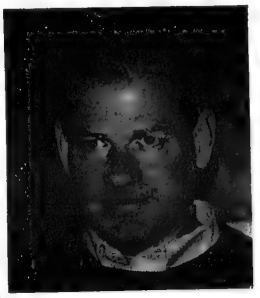
By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 46 years, the Givat Haviva Institute has promoted peace, tolerance and mutual respect between Israelis and Arabs, but with the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, the organization may be facing its stiffest test yet — promoting the same values between Jews.

Givat Haviva, winner of the prestigious Knesset Speaker's Award for Quality of Life for 1994-95, is hoping to open a dialogue between the people living in Israel and those in the territories, said David Koren, the organization's executive-director.

Koren, who was in Toronto recently, said Givat Haviva personnel will try to bring the same conflict-resolution skills to the intra-Jewish dispute that they have employed in improving Jewish-Arab relations.

"I think what's important here is to meet at our place, at their place, and open a dialogue that hasn't been there for at least 10 years," he said.



David Koren

"They used to call us Arab-lovers, leftists. We used to call them all kinds of names as well. Now it's time to sit and talk because both sides realize that the future will be different.

"We don't want to stay in the territories as conquerors and I think we can show some sympathy for their fears as well."

Koren said "It's going to be very hard to bring people to a real understanding. We believe they are wrong. They believe we are wrong."

Since it was founded in 1949 by the Kibbutz Artzi movement, it has expanded to six distinct departments: the Jewish-Arab Centre for Peace; Moreshet, a Holocaust education centre; an Arts Centre; Morot Hayalot, which trains female soldiers to work in Israel's schools to help youth with language and social problems; a research and archives department; and Makor, which educates immigrants in democratic values.

Givat Haviva is located on a 50-acre campus east of Hadera in Israel's "small triangle," a densely-populated, largely Arab area.

Each year, more than 10,000 people participate in Givat Haviva educational programs, which are presented by both Arabs and Jews.

One of the more successful programs pairs schools for one to three years during which students visit each other's classes.

Even in the midst of the intifadah, Givat Haviva opened a dialogue with Palestinian NGOs and labor unions, providing them with a channel of communication into Israeli society.

Givat Haviva's contacts with the Palestinian leadership continues. Two months ago, the organization was approached by the Palestinian Authority (PA) with the request that they set up a young leadership training program modeled on Givat Haviva's program for Hashomer Hatzair youth, Koren said.

Givat Haviva's Arab counsellors, with the consent of top Israeli officials, provided the training in Tulkarm and Ramallah. The hope was "to try to take these kids from the intifadah and involve them in other things, to steer them away from violence," Koren said.

CFGH helps the Israeli parent organization by providing funds (more than $180,000 last year), arranging programs, sponsoring the display of Jewish and Arab artwork at Harbourfront and through a mission to Israel, said Shari Wert, executive-director of the Canadian Friends.

Waterloo U launches chair of Jewish Studies

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

WATERLOO — The University of Waterloo launched a chair in Jewish Studies recently at a reception hosted by Pamela and Donald Bierstock at the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery.

The event also opened an exhibition titled Ceramics Israel.

The Israel consul to Toronto, Jehudi Kinar, said Jewish studies at the University of Waterloo will enable students to find the connection between biblical Israel and ceramics. He noted that the Dead Sea Scrolls were found in clay jars. "To this day, in every excavation, we find samples of old ceramics.

"As Judaism and Israel cannot be separated from each other, this chair will automatically bring Israel near to the Canadian people," he said.

The initiative to start a Jewish studies program at Waterloo resulted from a suggestion by Brian Hendley, dean of arts. Several months ago, Prof. Sidney Eisen, former dean of arts at York University and the founding director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies was approached by Prof. Paul Socken of the Waterloo French department, who is also chair of the Jewish Studies cabinet, to explore the possibilities of establishing a chair at Waterloo.

With cooperation between the Jewish studies program at York and the emerging program at Waterloo, the chair will now become a reality.

Noting the fiscal distress at universities, Jim Downey, president of Waterloo University, said the university was "blessed" by the support of the Bierstocks, "whose imagination and enthusiastic promotion of the project has warmed my heart and left me and the University of Waterloo profoundly in debt."

Socken announced that Czech Holocaust survivor Alexandre Raab, former owner of White Rose Nurseries, launched the campaign with a $200,000 pledge.

Donald Bierstock, who has lived in the Kitchener-Waterloo area all his life, serves with his wife Pamela (Libman) as co-chair of the committee to establish the chair in Jewish studies.

The display of 100 works by 31 of Israel's finest ceramic artists is on exhibit through Feb. 25, 1996.

Lori Brien, chairman of the board of the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery told the 400 people at the reception that Waterloo will be the only venue in Canada to host the Israeli exhibition.

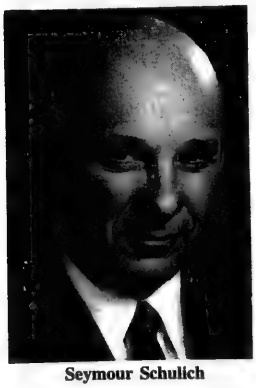
Entrepreneur gives York $15M donation

TORONTO — Canadian entrepreneur and philanthropist Seymour Schulich has donated $15 million to York University's School of Business, the largest gift of its kind to any Canadian university.

In recognition of Schulich's contribution, the school has been renamed the Schulich School of Business.

Schulich's donation will provide for new scholarships of up to $20,000 and endowed chairs to attract outstanding students and faculty.



Seymour Schulich

"Well-educated business leaders and entrepreneurs are crucial to our country's future if we are to succeed in the global economy," said Schulich, 55.

"Education has always been a priority for my family and we believe that if you've enjoyed Canadian privileges and our standard of living, you should give something back. The most important $2,000 in my life was a scholarship I received that allowed me to return to university for business education."

The North York resident, originally from Montreal, is chair and chief executive officer of Franco-Nevada Mining Corp. Ltd. and chair of Euro-Nevada Mining Corp. Ltd., both successful gold royalty companies.

York University is the third largest university in Canada. Its business school, founded in 1965, is the largest graduate management school in the country.

Student receives humanitarian award

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jason Dhanota, a 14-year-old high school student whose parents came to Canada from the Punjab, is the first winner of the Senpo Sugihara Humanitarian Award.

The $1,000 prize commemorates the Japanese consul in Lithuania who granted visas to 6,000 refugees escaping Hitler, despite Tokyo's rejection of the applications. The award recognizes young people in Metro for anti-rascism or humanitarian activities.

Dhanota, now a Grade 9 student at Leaside High School, won for his work as founder and president of PEACE (People for Equality and Acceptance of all Citizens of the Earth) while he was at Cosburn Middle School in East York.

The award was presented to the young student at a meeting at Temple Sinai by Moshe Ronen, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region chair, and David Fujiwara, Toronto chapter president of the National Association of Japanese Canadians. The two organizations sponsor the award.

Sugihara was so committed to saving Jews that he was still handing out visas through the window of the train taking him back to Japan in disgrace, Ronen said.

Dhanota was selected from a large number of nominations, the CJC officer said, adding that his school should be proud of him.

The meeting, also sponsored by the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and Temple Sinai social action committee, honored the memory of of Alan Coatsworth, a Christian Toronto businessman who, in 1929, sponsored a club for Jewish newsboys and others working at unskilled low-paying jobs, known as the Young Maccabees.

Although a total of 150 boys passed through the club's doors, only six, William and Max Simon, Dr. Philip Martin, Samuel Richardson, Max Milgrim and Irving Himel were present.

A debate on group rights versus individual rights was presented by Haroon Siddiqui, editorial page editor, Toronto Star; and Lorrie Goldstein, senior associate editor, Toronto Sun. Vision TV's Rita Deverell was moderator.

I'd 'rather be 70' centenarian says

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Catherine Feldman

TORONTO — Catherine Feldman, a former Hamiltonian now living at Baycrest Terrace, turns 100 this week. "It's just a number," she said offhandedly, then paused and confided she'd "rather be 70."

The Hungarian-born centenarian was the oldest of two sisters and one brother. Her father, a Budapest lawyer, became a widower when Catherine was 12.

Shortly thereafter she was sent to finishing school in Dresden, Germany to study music and literature.

In 1917, she married Rabbi Arthur Aaron Feldman, a fellow Hungarian 12 years her senior. The rabbi served as a World War I army chaplain, but was dismissed from service "because he didn't encourage the soldiers to fight but just talked of peace."

The young couple lived in Hungary for several years before joining relatives in the United States. In 1926 Rabbi Feldman accepted a position at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom, where he served as rabbi until his death from a heart attack in 1941.

After the Feldmans left Hungary, anti-Semitism became an increasing problem there. "My father was glad we left, for that reason," recalls Feldman.

But even in Canada she remembers seeing a sign, probably in the 1920s, for a "gentile hotel" that wouldn't accept Jewish guests.

"Things have changed for the better," she added.

Feldman's father, along with most of her other relatives, perished in the Holocaust.

A niece eventually immigrated to Canada, and pictures of her family are proudly displayed in Feldman's apartment.

Feldman and her husband had no children of their own, but she speaks with fondness of the youngsters she taught at Anshe Sholom's Sunday school, among them a "very clever little girl" who threatened that she wouldn't believe in God but only in Jesus if Feldman didn't sit beside her.

During World War II Feldman devoted her time to the war effort, knitting and packing boxes for prisoners of war.

After the war, she worked as a receptionist at Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre until age 70.

She was active in the Heart Fund Association, National Council of Jewish Women, Hadassah Bazaar and the Red Cross and used to visit hospital patients on a daily basis, bringing each person a flower.

CJC-Q satisfied with Quebec judge's apology

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) said last week it was satisfied by Judge Jean Bienvenue's apology for saying Jews who perished in the gas Nazi gas chambers did not suffer.

The Trois-Rivieres Superior Court justice's ultimate fate, however, may not be known for months to come.

CJC-Q, as well as women's groups and the provincial and federal governments, have formally asked the Canadian Judicial Council to conduct an inquiry over his remarks. The future for the 67-year-old judge, a one-time Liberal cabinet member, may rest in the hands of Parliament, which has the power to fire him, depending on what the Council recommends.

Bienvenue's four-sentence apology, coming after a two-hour closed-door meeting with CJC leaders, made no mention of his other statement that triggered an outcry: that women can sink "to a depth that the vilest of men would be unable to attain."

CJC-Q officials said they did not broach the women's issue with Bienvenue — even though it "bothers us equally," CJC-Q director Jack Jedwab told reporters — because that was more clearly the domain of women's groups.

But last week Jedwab told The CJN that CJC-Q would be in contact with the Quebec Federation of Women to follow up on the issue.

In the statement Bienvenue read to reporters, he said:

"I sincerely regret the pain my comments caused last week, especially to Holocaust survivors.

"As everyone recognizes, the horrors of the Holocaust are unparalleled in human history.

"That is why I recognize that using the Holocaust analogy to illustrate a situation I considered extreme, was not called for.

"In addition, I would like to apologize to all those who felt offended by this analogy."

After reading the statement, Bienvenue, trailed by a horde of media, left the Congress building without uttering another word.

CJC spokespersons and Stephen Bleyer, an Auschwitz survivor and president of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, said that Bienvenue, during their meeting, seemed genuinely contrite over his remarks.

Bleyer read him an eye-witness account of death in the gas chambers from historian Martin Gilbert's book, The Holocaust.

"After I read the passages, we came to the conclusion that he was going to make a statement," Bleyer said.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko said Bienvenue's apology was "unqualified, sensitive and intelligent," and addressed the three elements disturbing to the Jewish community: use of the Holocaust as an analogy to a single act of murder, the implication that Jews killed in gas chambers did not suffer, and the fact that survivors heard their "history diminished" by his comments.

CJC-Q chair Reisa Teitelbaum said CJC-Q hoped the council would take into account Bienvenue's apology in its assessement of him.

Robert Libman, director for B'nai Brith in Quebec, said that even with the apology, Bienvenue should be dismissed.

"We still feel that any judge capable of making such insensitive, ignorant remarks, is not worthy of the bench," Libman said.

Libman also felt it was a mistake for CJC-Q not to have Bienvenue deal with the women's issue in his apology, since in his view it feeds perceptions of the Jewish community as insular.

Art exhibit builds bridges

By MOURA WOLPERT

HAMILTON — Building Bridges, the Israeli-Palestinian art exhibit currently touring North America, had its gala opening recently at Temple Anshe Sholom here.

It is hoped the show will lead to dialogue between local Na'amat and Palestinian women, said Hamilton Na'amat president Wendy Schneider.

Over 200 guests, including about 50 Palestinians, attended the reception.

In his official greetings on behalf of Israel's consulate, the show's co-sponsor, consul Chaim Waxman said, "This coming together tonight of Jews, Israelis, Palestinians and Canadians is a small but meaningful step in the fulfilment of the peace process."

For Schneider, the biggest innovation to come out of the show was the connection she made with Elham Farah, a representative of the local Palestinian community.

Not only did the two women discover they were neighbors, but, said Schneider, they also found that "we have an equal passion and commitment to the peace process."

Farah, an art teacher with the Hamilton-Wentworth separate school board, is active on local human resource and multicultural committees.

Speaking on behalf of the federation, executive director Patricia Tolkin Eppel, said the evening was one "the likes of which many of us did not believe we would see in our lifetimes."

Hamilton West MP Stan Keyes, brought greetings from Ottawa and a congratulatory letter from Prime Minister Jean Chrétien; West Hamilton MPP Lillian Ross spoke for the provincial government; and Ward 1 alderman Marvin Caplan represented Mayor Bob Morrow.

The Hamilton show was sponsored by Na'amat and is the tour's only Canadian stop besides Toronto.

Israel violinist Ezra Atsmon, and Lebanese pianist Linda Shumas entertained. Curator Ian Ross and the Burlington Art Centre lent assistance.

Other sponsors included the Zukerman Charitable Foundation; Canadian Friends of Peace Now; Columbus Centre and the Meridian International Centre, Washington, D.C.

Anniversary celebrated

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Peretz Institute and school are celebrating their 50th anniversary.

The Peretz School was founded by secular humanists, socialists and Labor Zionists, all of whom wanted to be Jewish but in a secular fashion.

There were 39 students at first, housed in the basement of the old Jewish Community Centre at Oak and 11th. Now, the Peretz Institute has its own school and centre on Ash Street. It has over 100 students and provides activities for more than 100 member families.

Saul Wayne, 85, the first president, says the Peretz School was organized on the principle of "secular humanism," adopting the policies of Peretz schools that were opening in major Canadian centres.

A new Peretz School class has opened this year on the North Shore for members living in North Vancouver. In Vancouver, in addition to the school, the institute has a young people's theatre, secular Shabbat services and numerous community events. A 50th anniversary dinner was held recently.

Chrétien's Quebec challenge

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — It was often embarrassing to watch Prime Minister Jean Chrétien in the House of Commons during the question period this fall.

At times he seemed unsure of himself, lacking in strategy, approach or answers. Could he be losing the political skills that had served him well through three decades of political life?

He would stand at his desk, wavering, reaching for answers, mispronouncing words, forgetting names, losing a turn of phrase, turning around to pick up hints and forgotten words from helpful Liberal benchmates.

Preston Manning, who wants to be Opposition leader (or maybe even prime minister of the rest of Canada) so badly he can taste it, kept making references to Chrétien's mental health, suggesting Chrétien was acting irrationally and should be removed from office.

It was not a pleasant fall session for Chrétien. He realized how close he had come on Oct. 30 to losing it all. He also had to admit to himself how he almost blew it, how he mistakenly all but ignored the separatist referendum campaign until the final week, until it was almost too late.

Chrétien knows he won't be so lucky the next time.

And a next time there will be. If not in six months, then in a year. The separatists came out of the Oct. 30 referendum the moral, if not the numerical, winners. They know it and are getting ready for another try very soon.

Only a bad case of referendum fatigue among ordinary Quebecers is preventing the Parti Québécois (PQ) from having another run at it right away.

The next time, it will take more than a last minute pilgrimage of 100,000 concerned Canadians to Montreal three days before the vote to keep Quebec in Canada.

As the PQ was already saying that day: "We love you this week, we forget you next week."

Alas, a great many Canadians seem to have already forgotten the referendum and appear in no rush to try to solve the problems that led to the referendum in the first place Chrétien had to make good in the Commons this fall on the triple promise that he made to Quebec during the last week of the referendum campaign.

He had to get the Commons to pass a motion recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, give Quebec a veto power over future federal constitutional proposals affecting that province, and turn over federal training programs to the provinces, including Quebec.

For an old centralist like Chrétien, this was a triple helping of crow to eat in one gulp. He had to do it, if the federalists are to have any credibility in the next referendum.

Adversary setting the agenda

Chrétien certainly wasn't helped by his federalist friends like Saskatchewan Premier Roy Romanow, who was saying Ottawa should make one more try at a constitutional deal with the Quebec government. As if the PQ, so close to winning the next referendum, would trade it all away for a deal with Roy in the back kitchen in Ottawa.

B.C. Premier Mike Harcourt hardly distinguished himself either, jealously demanding a veto for British Columbia one day, getting it from Justice Minister Allan Rock the next, and then saying he didn't really want it after all, adding that it didn't make up for 20 years of neglect by Ottawa.

Most Canadians weren't much better; they went back to sleep, preferring to wait until the PQ calls the next referendum. Talk about letting your adversary set the agenda.

In Quebec, the whole question is still very much up in the air. If the rest of Canada is to act, now is the time, not in the last week of the next referendum campaign.

Chrétien has never understood Quebec, even though he comes from there. He understands English Canada.

It was English Canada that elected him prime minister. French-speaking Quebec voted for somebody else, a smooth-talking elegant, dark-haired man who ended up as leader of the Opposition.

Chrétien's problem is whether he can finally understand Quebec, figure out what to do and convince the rest of Canada that Quebec is distinct, that it needs a special status to protect that distinctiveness, and that the rest of Canada should be happy that Quebec is distinct, view it as an asset and strive to protect it.

All this must be done before it's too late. It is some challenge.

Chanukah Greetings from Forest Hill Place

In the Jewish community, the festival of Chanukah is a time for celebration, a time for giving, a time for sharing, and a time for family and friends. During this season, however, some people are reminded about the loneliness that fills their lives. For some seniors, this is especially true if they are living alone while family and friends are located in other parts of the city, the province, or the country.

At Forest Hill Place retirement residence, we understand the importance of friendship and companionship, and we pride ourselves in offering the very finest in retirement living.

At Forest Hill Place, there is always someone close by to share greetings and homemade latkes while enjoying the festival season. Residents and staff join together to kindle the Chanukah lights, and families are welcome to join in numerous traditional events and activities. During the festival of Chanukah, and all year round, the daily social and recreational activities, coupled with regularly scheduled entertainment provide a relaxing, social environment where friendships are made and memories are shared.

Forest Hill Place offers companionship and security.

It's a delight to invite friends and family to share the warmth of Chanukah at Forest Hill Place. Where else can you relax and enjoy the company of your guests while dinner is prepared for you in the elegant dining room? And this is only one of the many services Forest Hill Place has to offer. Housekeeping, laundry services, 24 hour emergency response systems, and 24 hour reception and security, combined with our superb meal services, enhance your peace of mind during the holiday season, and all year round.

Residents and staff of Forest Hill Place wish to extend their warmest greetings for the holiday season, and invite you to stop by and visit any time.

Syria shot down U.S. trial balloon on settlers

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. officials earlier this year explored the idea of allowing Jews to remain on the Golan Heights under Syrian sovereignty, but President Hafez al-Assad rejected the suggestion, it has been learned here.

It remains unclear whether Washington asked that all or only a portion of the estimated 11,000 Golan settlers be allowed to remain.

Assad dismissed the idea, telling American negotiators, "Just a few years ago, you wanted me to let the [Syrian] Jews go; now you want me to let Jews stay in Syria."

The U.S. conveyed his response to then prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres has yet to make his own views on the subject known, but he has expressed support in principle for the possibility that some West Bank and Gaza settlers would live under Palestinian sovereignty as part of a permanent status arrangement.

Some Palestinian Authority officials, such as Maj.-Gen. Nasser Yussef, have accepted the idea.

U.S. diplomatic sources refused to discuss the substance of negotiations.

President Ezer Weizman expressed cautious optimism over the future of peace talks with Syria, after meeting last Sunday morning with the Vatican's secretary of state for foreign affairs.

"There is hope," Weizman said, "but we have to be very cautious, to be on our guard, and not have too many expectations."

There are also indications that Israel may reconsider Rabin's position that withdrawal from the Golan take place in phases over a four-year period, and may accept a shorter period.

Sources say that could lead to faster normalization between Israel and Syria.

Furthermore, it could reduce the prospects of domestic political complications. In Peres's words, it is easier to take one step over a chasm than two steps.

Rabin preferred a longer withdrawal period because he felt it gave him more time to test Syrian intentions.

Health ministry okays soufganiot

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli consumers can eat commercially-made jelly doughnuts (soufganiot) without being concerned about contamination of the oil — that is, if about 400 calories apiece is of no concern.

The Health Ministry's food service division announced last Thursday that in a survey of doughnuts sold around the country, inspectors found the oil in which they had been fried had been changed periodically, as required, and that the dough had been fried at proper temperatures.

They also found that that the filling did not contain an excess of food coloring.

Inspectors took 83 samples and did not find any health risks, except that the doughnuts were fattening. The ministry said it would continue to conduct lab tests until the end of Chanukah.

As for that other holiday delicacy, Israel Weight Watchers director-general Lilit Romam said that the average potato pancake, at about 180 calories, was preferable to a doughnut, but that it was best to use only a bit of oil to fry latkes.

It is even healthier to take the potato mixture and bake it as a kugel in the oven with little oil, she said.

Arafat's peace policy subjected to criticism by various opponents

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Yasser Arafat was visibly traumatized by Yitzhak Rabin's murder. He dreaded that the Oslo peace process might die with Rabin and he feared that he could be next in line for an assassin's bullet.

Less than two weeks after Rabin's assassination, the Palestine National Authority announced that a plot against Arafat's life had been uncovered in the Gaza Strip. The five apparent killers were members of the Abu Nidal organization, which categorically rejects peace with Israel.

Clearly, Arafat is a marked man, even though most of his critics do not wish to see him dead. Nevertheless, they are bitterly unreconciled to his policies with regard to Israel.

In the Palestinian diaspora, Arafat is a formidable figure, the chair of the PLO, the leader of the PLO's Fatah faction and the head of the Palestine National Authority. No other Palestinian wields as much power and influence or is held in such reverence.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Hardliners reject Oslo process

Be that as it may, Arafat has come under a crescendo of criticism since the signing of the Declaration of Principles (DoP) in September 1993. Critics have lambasted not only the DoP, but the Oslo 1 (May 1994) and Oslo 2 (September 1995) agreements.

The Palestinian rejectionist camp is composed of three elements: those who reject an accommodation with Israel altogether, those who consider the Oslo process fatally flawed and basically unjust, and those who take issue with certain aspects of the PLO's historic rapprochement with Israel.

Opposition to Arafat ranges from the secular nationalism of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine: General Command to the Islamic fundamentalism of Hamas. These diehard Palestinians firmly believe that Israel should be replaced by either a "democratic, secular state in Palestine" or an Islamic state.

They have been at odds with Arafat for some years now, particularly since his 1988 declaration accepting Israel's existence.

These hardliners are supported in various degrees by such Middle Eastern countries as Iran, Libya, Iraq, Syria and Sudan.

Arafat's second set of detractors are made up of Palestinians who theoretically desire peace but who are loathe to come to terms with Israel's expanded post-1949 boundaries.

They want to push back Israel's borders so that the country is no bigger than that envisaged by the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan (which the Arab world unanimously spurned).

For various reasons, they are deeply skeptical of the DoP. To their amazement, the most substantial issues — the fixing of final borders, Jerusalem, the status of Jewish settlements and the Palestinian refugees' right of return — have been left for last. And they feel a sense of betrayal that an independent Palestinian state may not emerge from the PLO's protracted talks with Israel.

The chief exponents of this view are Edward Said — a professor of English literature at Columbia University and the PLO's intellectual-in-residence — and Farouk Kaddoumi, the PLO's foreign minister.

Not surprisingly, Kaddoumi has urged Palestinians to boycott elections in the territories that are scheduled for Jan. 20, 1996. He claims the elections should not be held under Israeli occupation and under Israeli terms.

Disapproval of Arafat's policies also emanates from a loose coalition of Palestinians who originally embraced the DoP but who now condemn it.

They are disillusioned with the delays that have accompanied the implementation of the DoP. They are angered that much of the West Bank and 40 per cent of the Gaza Strip are still in Israel's hands. They are bitter that the Jewish population in the territories has expanded rather than contracted. They fear that the Jewish settlements will not be dismantled, and that Israel will try to retain a good portion of the West Bank.

The leading proponents of this school are Abu Mazen, who negotiated the DoP, and Haidar Abdel Shafi, who led the Palestinian delegation at the 1991 Madrid conference.

Despite these scathing critiques, the majority of Palestinians in the territories are unequivocably behind the peace process and consider Arafat their supreme leader, according to surveys conducted by Palestinian think-tanks.

In the latest poll, carried out by the Centre for Palestinian Research and Study, respondents were asked about their attitude to the Oslo 2 accord. Seventy two per cent were in favor, 18 per cent were opposed and 10 per cent had no opinion.

Such statistics are hard to wish away or ignore, even by Arafat's foes. In a remarkable admission recently, Hamas' representative in Lebanon conceded that the Middle East peace process is irreversible.

Hamas, he said, could only obstruct the process, not destroy it. "In sum total," he concluded, "Arafat has triumphed over the opposition."

If this is true, the peace process may be in better shape than some think.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 11

• Ma'ariv reported that the amount of foreign investment in Israel had grown by 140 per cent over the previous year. As of the end of September, approximately $275 million (US) has been invested in Israel, compared to $114 million (US) for all of 1994.

• Ma'ariv also reported that an Israeli astronaut will soon begin training to take part in a NASA space shuttle mission. (Dr. Eran Schenker, director of the Israeli Aerospace Medical Institute was named later in the week to be that astronaut.)

Dec. 12

• Yediot Aharonot reported that Avigdor Kahalani will become chair of The Third Way, a recently formed political party. The paper said that the appointment will last for five months to enable the party to organize its internal elections. Former IDF chief of staff Dan Shomron had earlier announced that he was leaving the party.

Dec. 13

• Following a meeting with King Hassan II in Morocco, Prime Minister Shimon Peres announced that Morocco may establish full diplomatic ties with Israel even before the conclusion of an Israel-Syrian peace agreement.

Dec. 14

• Yediot Aharonot reported that Msgr. John Louis Turan, the foreign minister of the Vatican, will make an official visit to Israel from Dec.17 to Dec. 20.

• Uri Elitzur, editor of Nekuda, the Yesha settlers' bulletin, suggested in a column that the Yesha Council should begin a rapprochement with the Palestinian Authority. "I recommend speaking with the Authority directly. We have thousands of issues to settle with them and I suggest we start doing it immediately."

Dec. 15

• Ma'ariv reported a "further defection" from the Likud to David Levy's party. Rivka Bar-Lev, a member of Likud for 15 years and its representative in Na'amat, advised that she would be joining Levy's party.

Canada commended for role facilitating refugee talks

CJN News Services

GENEVA — Canada won praise last Thursday as an "effective gavel holder" at an international meeting to bring the fruits of Middle East peace to nearly three million Palestinian refugees.

The three-day meeting of the Refugee Working Group, chaired by Canada and attended by more than 40 delegations, concluded last week with millions of dollars pledged for projects aimed at helping Palestinians reap "tangible benefits of peace."

"We've been very fortunate to have a very effective gavel holder from Canada, demonstrating once again the important role Canada plays in the Middle East process," said Thomas Fieffer, U.S. assistant to the Special Middle East Coordinator.

Fieffer praised the group for bringing practical results to refugees in the West Bank, Gaza, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria.

Canada has been playing an active role in the working group since 1992.

"We're a country without a colonial past and one which has had a long tradition of being helpful in the Middle East," said meeting chair Andrew Robinson.

Robinson, director-general for the Middle East process at the foreign affairs department, thinks Canada was chosen because of its "known sense of balance with respect to the Middle East."

The Refugee Working Group was established in 1992 as part of the multilateral track of the peace process, co-sponsored by Russia and the United States. It is intended to complement bilateral peace efforts involving Israel and the Palestinians.

The United Nations estimates 2.8 million Palestinian refugees are registered in the Middle East. Formal bilateral talks on their status are to begin in May. In the mean time, the multilateral working group is the only forum where refugee questions are addressed.

"This is a very intimate problem that lies at the very heart of the Arab-Israeli dispute of the Israeli-Palestinian question," Robinson said.

"Solving it is going to be one of the most difficult problems."

For the first time, Saudi Arabia contributed $20 million to the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees.

And Kuwait contributed $1 million to Canada Camp, set up by the Canadians in Israeli-occupied Sinai following the 1956 Suez crisis and now used as a refugee camp. The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) is funding repatriation of Palestinian families from Canada Camp to Gaza.

Canada announced a further contribution of $200,000 to help refurbish a hospital for Palestinian refugees in Beirut.

In all, Canada is helping to fund 44 refugee projects in Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, the West Bank and Gaza. It has contributed $11 million to UNRWA for 1995-96.

Minister backtracks; rejects suggestion of murder conspiracy

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's Internal Security Minister Moshe Shahal last week rejected accusations of a conspiracy surrounding the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

Answering a motion by MK Yosef Ba-Gad, Shahal said the rumors are "the work of a fertile imagination," and suggested Ba-Gad consider a career in writing spy stories.

Shahal said none of Ba-Gad's contentions were based on fact. "They are fed by, and feed, the media," Shahal said.

Asked whether there was a conspiracy, Shahal answered flatly, "There was no such thing."

Earlier however, he had claimed there was such a conspiracy. On Nov. 9, he said, "We also believe that a group of people carefully prepared the ground to conspire to murder carefully chosen targets."

Two days later, he said confessed assassin Yigal Amir had tried to kill Rabin twice before, "but there were apparently additional attempts in which he and others, or others alone, tried to assassinate the prime minister."

On Nov. 22, Shahal said he had changed his mind and did not think there had been a conspiracy to kill Rabin.

Ba-Gad also raised a series of questions, all previously asked in the media, including:

- Why had Avishai Raviv not told the General Security Service of Yigal Amir's intentions?
- Why didn't the GSS act on information received?
- Why didn't wounded security man Yoram Rubin recognize Amir, who was a fellow Bar-Ilan University student?
- Why didn't the security guards respond with gunfire?
- Who shouted that the gun had "only dummy bullets"?
- Who was behind the announcement to the media the night of the shooting that the assassination had been unsuccessful "this time"?
- Why was Leah Rabin told her husband had been shot by dummy bullets?
- What was behind the widespread story that a security guard had committed suicide or been killed and secretly buried?

Likud MK Ovadia Eli said these questions should be answered by a commission of inquiry and not in the Knesset. Not one MK supported Ba-Gad's call for an in-depth discussion of the rumors.

Bnei Akiva founder remembered

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Thousands attended last Tuesday's funeral of Rabbi Moshe Zvi Neriya, who founded the first yeshivah high school in Israel.

Rabbi Neriya died Dec. 12 at his home in Kfar Haroeh. He was 83.

MK Yigal Bibi (National Religious Party), also one of Rabbi Neriya's students, said, "He founded the Bnei Akiva yeshivot. Up until his time, you either went to yeshivah or went to a high school. He created the synthesis."

As such, Bibi said, Rabbi Neriya was the father of the integration of yeshivah students "into all aspects of society — the army, the professions, academia."

Rabbi Neriya was born in Lodz in 1913, and arrived in Palestine in 1930. He went to the Mercaz Harav Yeshivah in Jerusalem and became a disciple of Rabbi Avraham Hacohen Kook, later to become Israel's first Chief Rabbi.

In 1940, he moved to Kfar Haroeh and started a yeshivah with 13 students. It served as a model for a vast network of Bnei Akiva yeshivot, high schools for girls, and other educational institutions that today enrol thousands of students.

In the last three years, Rabbi Neriya was a strong opponent of the peace process. He was among the rabbis who signed a halachic decision earlier this year saying that soldiers are forbidden to evacuate IDF bases in the territories. Last year, at a prayer service at the Western Wall, Neriya amended the prayer for the welfare of the state, adding a phrase asking God to save the country "from its leaders, officers and counsellors."

Rabbi Neriya served as a National Religious Party MK from 1969 to 1973, and in 1978 received the Israel Prize for his "special contribution to the state of Israel and its society."

Refugee ruling called 'scary'

But the board also said that as a Jew, Grygorian could have availed herself of Israel's Law of Return and immigrated there.

The woman, who claimed to have suffered anti-Semitic persecution in her last place of residence, Azerbaijan, "can, as a right, obtain Israeli citizenship by a mere formality of application," the IRB stated.

The Law of Return guarantees citizenship to anyone who can prove one Jewish grandparent and who states an intention to settle in Israel.

Because Grygorian is Jewish, she has no well-founded fear of persecution in Israel, which would take her in right away, and does not require Canadian protection, the IRB found.

Jewish communal officials and immigration lawyers said the IRB panel misread the Law of Return, which requires an intention to settle in Israel. Grygorian came to Canada in 1994 to join her daughter in Toronto.

At the time, officials were confident the court would quash the ruling and order a new hearing for Grygorian.

But the court agreed that Grygorian should not get asylum.

"Canada's refugee claims system is not just another quick fix to obtain landed status here," said Justice Marcel Joyal in a ruling obtained by The CJN.

"The basic principle of refugee law is to grant such status only to those requiring surrogate protection," Joyal's ruling said, "and not to those who have ready and automatic right to another country's nationality."

Joyal said he saw no reason to criticize the IRB's decision.

"In essence, the issue was whether or not the applicant, on claiming refuge or asylum in Canada, had failed to seek national protection elsewhere," he wrote.

Harvey Savage, a Toronto immigration lawyer who handles refugee claims from Jews, called the ruling "scary and repulsive."

The ruling "applies to no other nationality" than Jews, Savage said. "They may have found a way to close the door on asylum [in Canada] for Jews around the world. It's frightening. It's crazy."

Savage said he's heard from sources at the IRB that panels will be emboldened by the court's judgment at future hearings.

The decision "will cause a lot of agonizing."

TAKING A BREAK

Riding along a 300-kilometre route from Jerusalem to Eilat, 48 cyclists from Toronto recently raised about $150,000 for student programs and the faculty of dentistry at Hebrew University. Here, the group takes a break outside Eilat. The "Mission With a Difference '95" was the second bike mission in support of HU.

Maccabi Canada announces triple-barrel coup

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No one will mistake them for the Montreal Canadiens, but there should be some pretty good talent to send over the boards when Jacques Demers handles Canada's entry in an upcoming international hockey event.

Demers, who guided the Habs to a Stanley Cup win in 1993, has agreed to coach Canada's entry to the 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The announcement was the third part of a triple-barrel coup heralded recently by Maccabi Canada. The first, that hockey had been added as an official Maccabiah sport, would warm the hearts of any red-blooded Canuck.

The second was that hockey legend Jean Beliveau had agreed to served as honorary chef de mission for the Canadian team. Beliveau, a Hall of Fame centre who has enough Stanley Cup rings for the fingers of both hands, held the same position in 1985, when he visited Israel for the first time as part of the Maccabi Canada delegation.

Getting hockey recognized as an official Maccabiah sport was a long time coming, said Allen Gerskup, a member of Maccabi Canada's six-man national athletic committee.

Canada was at the forefront of lobbying efforts with the Maccabi World Union (MWU), where Torontonian Bernie Offstein is a member, to include hockey as a sport. But it wasn't until an Olympic-sized rink was under construction in Metulla and four countries agreed to participate, that hockey could become an official event, Gerskup said.

With the recent completion of a new rink at Canada Centre in Metulla and the agreement by the United States to ice a team, Canada's goals were met and the MWU sanctioned hockey at its annual meeting.

Joining Canada and the United States will be teams from Israel and the former Soviet Union.

Canadian Maccabi organizers have long wished to ice a team, but the absence of a rink made that impossible.

"We pushed [for it because] in the past, Israelis came to us saying we don't get the recognition we used to. 'Bring your best athletes,' they said. We said our best are our hockey players."

Gerskup said good ties between former Maccabi Canada president Gary Ulrich and the Montreal Canadiens organization helped pave the way for the involvement of high-profile Habs hockey figures. In April, Maccabi Canada will honor Beliveau at a dinner that will also help raise funds for the organization.

Gideon Lee has been named as Ontario chair of Maccabi hockey.

Jacques Demers

Lee is the former coach of the Israeli national team and a longtime coach in the Toronto minor hockey system. His Quebec counterpart is David Lisbona.

They have already begun beating the bushes for talent, while putting together a team of volunteers to help in scouting and fundraising, Lee said.

"We're looking for the best players available" and that could include professionals, he added.

While there are several Jews playing in the National Hockey League and in minor pro leagues, Lee said he expects to hear mostly from junior, juvenile and college-calibre prospects, although no one will be turned away.

Pros and players in Canada's major junior leagues may not want to risk injury in a summer tournament, he suggested.

"I estimate we'll have 500 players trying out across Canada," the biggest response to a Maccabi sport yet, Gerskup said.

Regional tryout camps will be set up and anyone can participate, though players must first become affiliated with the Maccabi organization.

Those who show well in the tryout will be brought to either Toronto or Montreal for final selections, Gerskup said. "I think we'll have a very good team."

"We're all very, very excited," said Bob Luxenberg, chair of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee.

"First of all, it will bring into the competition a segment of the population who could never take part previously because there were no winter sports.

"Second, this is also exciting for Israel because it will bring the northern area into the games," Luxenberg told The CJN's David Lazarus in Montreal.

Cost to send an athlete to Israel is about $5,500, making fundraising a key part of the Maccabi endeavor. Hockey, being a prestige sport, might raise Maccabi Canada's profile and make it easier to raise funds, Maccabi official Gord Garshowitz said.

For more information about the hockey program, Lee can be reached by fax at: 416-223-4041.

Israel hosts figure-skating competition

TORONTO — Completion of an Olympic-sized rink in Metulla has not only boosted the development of hockey in Israel, it's also given figure skating a shot in the arm.

For the first time ever, Israel has hosted an international figure skating competition at Canada Centre, the recreation complex built with the help of the Canadian Jewish community.

About 70 skaters from more than 20 countries participated in the inaugural Skate Israel event last week.

In the men's competition, Israel was represented by Misha Shmerkin, ranked 11th in the world. Shmerkin, a native of Odessa, finished second at the Skate Canada competition in November.

Also skating for Israel in the men's event was national team member Dennis Gorbazov.

Galia Chait and Sergei Sachnovsky represented the Jewish state in the dance competition. The pair earned a third place finish at the 1995 Ukrainian Cup.

While Canada was not represented at the event, skating powerhouses like Russia, Ukraine, Germany, England and France participated. Dmitry Dmitrenko of Ukraine, the 1992 world champion, was among the skaters expected to attend.

Games to feature additional events

VANCOUVER — Canada's chances for an additional medal at the next Maccabiah Games in Israel improved with the announcement that "flat water kayak sprint racing" will be included at the 1997 competition.

Dari Fisher, a member of Canada's national champion four-man team is already looking forward to the Israeli games.

"We are now trying to locate potential Canadian team members, 'paddlers,' who have had club, provincial or national competitive experience and who are interested in participating," Fisher said.

At least six nations have already expressed interest in sending teams for the K-1 (one-man boat) and K-2 (two-man boat) events, which will include 200-, 500- and 1,000-metre races. All races will be held at the Sea of Galilee in Israel's north.

Other sports making their debut at the '97 games include hockey, figure skating, beach volleyball, and tae kwan do.

Never "two" sick to face the hooded fang

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eight-year-old actor Zale Mednick knows what it means to be a trouper.

A sore throat and low-grade fever (controlled by medication) couldn't stop the young star of Jacob Two-Two Meets the Hooded Fang from appearing recently before a full house at the 468-seat Young Peoples Theatre.

Mednick is on stage for most of the 105-minute show, which closes Dec. 31. His character, a 6-year-old who says everything twice in order to be heard, sings, dances and outwits his gleefully nasty tormentors at the murky children's prison on Slimer's Isle, where he is serving a sentence of two years, two months, two weeks, two days, two hours and two minutes for unintentional "insulting behavior to a big person."

After the morning performance for an audience of schoolchildren, Mednick participated with fellow cast members in an on-stage question-and-answer session before settling down for a newspaper interview.

Dark-haired, polite and serious, with big brown eyes behind wire-rimmed glasses, Mednick said he would consider cancelling a performance "only if I have a horrible fever, about 120 [degrees]. I just think you should always try your best."

Despite his young age, Mednick has a solid base of experience. After requesting that his mother, Robin, get him an agent while he was still in kindergarten, he started doing voiceovers and television commercials before joining the children's musical theatre troupe Charactors.

Personality and self-possession

He appeared in the ensemble of Bye Bye Birdie while he was still 5, then played Kurt in The Sound of Music at the Factory Theatre and Doodie in Grease, all Charactors productions. He will appear in the Charactors production of Pyjama Game at the Fairview Library Theatre in May.

Earlier this year he appeared with Choirworks as part of the children's chorus in Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat at the O'Keefe Centre.

His personality and self-possession caught the attention of Joseph star Donny Osmond as well as radio station CFRB's entertainment reporter Jeremy Brown, who made a point of finding out Mednick's name to include in an on-air review.

While still performing in Joseph, Mednick learned that he'd been chosen to play the part of Jacob Two-Two, child hero of Mordecai Richler's well-loved children's book.

Like Jacob Two-Two, Mednick is the youngest in his family. "Once I had to say one thing 10 times because nobody heard me," said Mednick, who has two brothers and a sister.

A student at United Synagogue Day School, Mednick received intensive tutoring in August to prepare for Grade 3. His favorite subject is gym, but with a schedule of six or seven shows a week, he hasn't made it to any gym classes yet.

A competitive downhill skier, Mednick also likes hockey, tennis and baseball. He hasn't yet decided what he wants to do when he grows up, because of his many interests.

An acting career is one possibility. "I like performing in front of an audience. I've always been really happy when I act."

Zale Mednick stars as Mordecai Richler's Jacob Two-Two.

Ocean Wine a hit

TORONTO– A recent graduate of the Vancouver Film School has won awards at two U.S. film festivals recently.

Jules Pitch, 21, of Richmond Hill, Ont. was the associate producer and assistant director of Ocean Wine, a 30-minute dramatic film based on Greek drama.

The film, which was shot on the island of Nantucket received the Finalist Award at this year's World-Fest (the Houston International Film Festival) and the Gold Award at this year's Charleston International Film Festival. Houston has the largest amount of entries in the short film category in the world.

William Gibson's Golda lives up to its hard-luck reputation

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It bombed on Broadway, survived a fire in the theatre at its tryout in Boston and had to end its run when star Anne Bancroft collapsed on stage from exhaustion.

Golda, the play by William Gibson about Golda Meir, lived up to its hard-luck reputation when staged recently by the Holy Blossom Stagecraft Company. At the last minute, a power failure wiped out 73 lighting cues, bedevilling its three performances.

Instead, the audience had to cope with a row of bright lights as the Yom Kippur War of 1973 unfolded amidst flashbacks in the tumultous life of the Israeli prime minister to Milwaukee, New York, Chicago and the island of Cyprus.

Golda is a difficult play about a difficult woman and it does not hold firm at its centre. A few years after it failed, Gibson wrote a piece saying he had rewritten it several times, that Golda Meir, who attended its premiere, did not like it and told Bancroft in her dressing room that she did not agree with her portrayal. Also, Simcha Dinitz, then Israeli ambassador to Washington, one of the characters portrayed, objected, and scenes involving him had to be rewritten.

So it is little wonder that the new Holy Bloossom company overextended itself in attempting Golda, despite the efforts of director Bill Tepper, producer Roberta Presser and a hard-working earnest cast of 21. Several had to play four or five different roles and that didn't help in keeping track of the time frames, disappearing actors and unintelligible sound cues from the battlefronts.

As Golda, Susanne Egier, wearing a business suit, failed to bring Mother Israel to life, and Heather Finestone, strident as Young Golda, lacked humanity in depicting a young socialist choosing both marriage and a career. But they were victims of a play which lost its main character in a maze of political and personal events. A cameo performance of a wide-eyed TV interviewer by Judy Malkin was one of the acting highlights.

The company, which dedicated its performances, attended by 500 people, to the memory of Yitzhak Rabin, deserves congratulations for attempting such a difficult play

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers should forward any questions to The CJN.

Many self-help books are available for job hunters. Most are designed as reference books and include practical tips on how to look for a job. Some newer books like Job Hunting for Dummies also offer a crash course in hunting for work on the Internet. Through the Brick Wall offers excellent advice based on real-life experience, to help job hunters feel better about themselves; and a book called Job Shift teaches how to find work when traditional jobs are disappearing. All three are available at bookstores.

One new book, Canada's Best Employers for Women, is not yet widely available, but it is highly recommended. It not only tells which employers in Canada are the best ones to work for, it also details why these employers are so terrific. Mostly, the employers stand out because of the alternative working arrangements they are able to provide for their employees. Over 125 employers who together employ over half a million Canadians were interviewed for the book, and their responses and suggestions are recorded. In a time of cutbacks and downsizing, this book offers ideas on how individuals can still find work in almost any field.

The book examines each organization in detail and looks at the nature of the work in all of them.

Canada's Best Employers for Women is not intended to sit on the shelf for reference purposes alone. It should be read cover to cover, because it teaches the reader to have confidence in his or her working skills. The book emphasizes the need to express this self-confidence in the job hunt and in negotiation of working duties.

Examples are given of workers who are coping in their jobs because they stood up for themselves and their needs. Employers who are, in general, responsive to the needs of their employees experience increased productivity and reduced conflicts among staff.

Though the book is directed to women, it is also useful for men because employers who are good for women are responsive to the needs of men as well. In fact, with women moving into non-traditional positions, spaces that were previously reserved for women are opening up for men. In today's marketplace, few jobs are designed specifically for a man or a woman.

The book should also be read by human resource professionals and company executives to help them see how much their organizations can gain when they make their workplaces responsive to the needs of their employees. Alternative working arrangements such as job sharing, reduced work weeks, telecommunicating and flextime can maintain high organization results while keeping workers happy.

Before writing this article, I contacted several of the organizations written about in this book. Each one stated that since the book was published, the organization has further improved because of the programs they were involved in, the ones reported on in the book. Most organizations also said they would welcome calls for employment.

When you choose a book, make sure the information in it is recent. The marketplace changes rapidly and therefore a book on resume making from 10 years ago won't necessarily be useful today. A book on attitude changing, on the other hand, might.

Canada's Best Employers for Women is available at selected bookstores or by sending a cheque for $22.95 to Frank Communications, 253 College Street, Suite 200, Toronto, Ont., M5T 1R5.

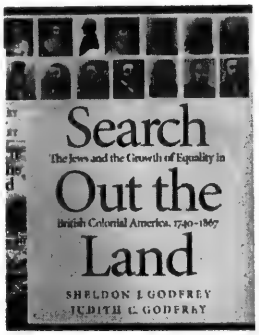
Search Out The Land: British authorities in the 1700s and 1800s encouraged Jews to come to the New World and help develop the colonies, according to a new ground-breaking academic work that is "the first extensively documented study of the early history of the Jews in Canada," according to Sheldon Godfrey, one of its two co-authors.

Released earlier this month, Search Out The Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America, 1740-1867 (McGill-Queen's University Press, $34.95) is the product of 10 years of research by Godfrey, a Toronto lawyer with a postgraduate degree in Canadian history, and his wife, Judith Godfrey, a conservationist and occupational therapist.

"We found that Jews in Canada had a much more positive role in developing the country than anyone had expected," he said during a book-launch party held in an elegant office next door to the historic 1833 post office on Adelaide St. E. that he and his wife restored 15 years ago.

"The British thought the Jews were essential in the struggle for colonial empires. They saw the Jews as having enormous capital, speaking several languages, taking risks and having international contacts as merchants."

During the French period of colonization that ended in 1759, numerous non-Catholics, including Jews, were deported from what would become Canada, according to Godfrey. By contrast, the British bestowed a de facto equality to the Jews long before other ethnic and religious minorities would receive the same rights.



The cover of the Godfreys' book

In its 432 pages, Search Out The Land brings to light many astonishing details of Canadian Jewish history, such as the observation that the first person to acquire legal title to land in pre-Confederate Canada was John Franks, a Jew who received an allotment in Halifax in 1749. As well, it documents the dominance of the Great Lakes fur trade by Jews at the beginning of British rule.

On another level, the book evidently seems to lay out a historical and legal framework for a positive definition of Canadian nationality, based on an acknowledgement of the rights of individuals of diverse origins. Godfrey, who is also chair of the Heritage Canada Foundation, asserts that the book thus provides important background on the central issues currently affecting the country.

In 1991, the Godfreys published Burn This Gossip, a biography of George Benjamin, a Jewish member of Parliament in pre-Confederate Canada. Search Out The Land should be available soon in bookstores, or directly through The Duke & George Press, Box 1, 260 Adelaide St. E., Toronto M5A 1N0.

Eric Nagler to Perform: Eric Nagler, known for his role on the musical situation comedy Eric's World, which is seen on YTV, TVO and other television stations, is set to perform at the Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, 3600 Bathurst St., Toronto, on Dec. 24 at 11 a.m.

A veteran family entertainer with more than 25 years of experience, Nagler is in the recording studio often — he released two new albums last September — but he says he likes doing live concerts best.

"At my concerts, families are encouraged to participate in the joy of making music," he says. "Children should not simply sit and let the music wash over them. I want them to bring their homemade instruments, their spoons, paper-tube maracas or waxpaper combs and become a star of the performance, too!"

Tickets, available at the Negev and Israel's bookstores, are $10 per person.

All-women's concert spreads its message that the Mashiach is on the way

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Over 400 women from all denominations and all walks of life turned out at the Leah Posluns Theatre recently for a women's only concert billed as The Ultimate Simchah.

Bina Cole, a representative of the concert's organizer, The International Campaign To Bring Mashiach — Toronto, says the organization sponsored the first-ever concert because "the Lubavitcher Rebbe told us that it is our job to spread the message and prepare the people for the coming of Mashiach. Announcements must be made about the importance of increasing simchah with the intent of bringing Mashiach."

She added she was thrilled with the tremendous response they received from the concert and she paid tribute to the talent and strength of Jewish women.

The all-women cast of singers, musicians and actors dedicated their acts throughout the three-hour program to the beauty of Judaism and to the ultimate coming of the Mashiach. While Alyssa Hershkop and Ella Drylov played a haunting violin-piano duet, children, dressed as a mother and father, pantomimed the blessings of candles and wine.

In a song composed by Ariella Goldberg, a chorus sang about breaking down all barriers and stretching out our arms to everyone. "Let us greet Mashiach with joyful songs and a joyful heart."

Cole said the concert was dedicated to the recovery of a woman in the community who is ill. "When Mashiach comes, there will be no more sickness. Through our gathering we will affect her and every other person."

Dinner in Damascus?

JERUSALEM – Call them optimists but Israeli tour operators have already begun examining prospects of sending tourists to Syria.

Israelis may be able to vacation in Syria two weeks after the opening of the border between the two countries, which would occur after a peace agreement is signed, Israel Radio reported last week.

The report indicated that representatives from an Israeli travel firm, the Ne'ot Hakikar Geographic Society, met with Syrian tour operators during a recent conference in Jordan.

"No arrangements have been made yet. We are just in the process of preparing the infrastructure and all the details," Moshe Savir of Ne'ot Hakikar said. "It will come only after a breakthrough in the political process."

Savir said once such visits were made possible as a result of a treaty, Israeli visitors would find the Syrian people welcoming.

Dear Jesse,

I am still sitting shivah for my mother.

My 84-year-old father has just announced that he is going back home as soon as shivah is over. My mother took care of him and their home for the last 60 years. Not only can't my father boil water but his memory has deteriorated so that if he tried, he might forget and cause a fire.

Please, where can I find someone to take care of him?

A. S.

Dear A. S.,

Please accept my sincere sympathy during this very difficult time for both you and your father.

Although there is no question that your intentions are thoughtful, pause and talk to your father before making arrangements for him. I know that you might feel better if someone is there to take care of him, but he must have a say on how he wants to live his life.

Encourage your father to be seen by a geriatric assessment team. This might reassure you or encourage your father to accept help.

There may be other services in your community or his synagogue that might fill some of his time. Investigate and encourage him so that he is not isolated from his peers.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.
